Indonesia: Half a million IDPs wait to return, while fighting continues in Aceh

With the exception of the province of Aceh, where a military operation has been ongoing since May 2003, and Maluku province where tension remains high after an outbreak of intercommunal violence in April 2004, most of Indonesia's former hot spots have now been in a post-conflict recovery phase for the past two years. The crackdown in Aceh has led to the government effectively sealing off the province to foreign aid workers. Over 2,000 people have died and at least 125,000 civilians have been displaced, although often temporarily, since the beginning of the offensive. However, many more are feared to have avoided official camps by hiding in the forest or seeking refuge with relatives. Despite the lifting of martial law exactly a year after its imposition and its replacement by a state of civil emergency in May 2004, humanitarian access to the province and independent monitoring remains extremely limited.

Elsewhere in the country, the situation for those internally displaced is often more hopeful. Since 2003 a large number of people have returned home or opted to settle elsewhere; for them the priority now is rebuilding their livelihoods, reconciling with old neighbours or integrating in new environments, and accessing land. An estimated half a million internally displaced people (IDPs), however, remain unable to return, either because of ongoing conflicts or because of continued hostility from the ethnic/religious groups that forced them out. Return is still problematic in and to Aceh, Central Kalimantan, Maluku province and Central Sulawesi. Yet, the government, keen to declare the country's internal displacement crisis resolved, in January 2004 withdrew IDP status from the remaining displaced people in all regions. The displaced are now considered as "vulnerable people" and responsibility for their assistance has shifted from the central government to the provinces. Only when the transition from emergency assistance to economic recovery and long-term sustainable development is achieved can the empowerment, relocation or return of the displaced be successful and their displacement end. With no further central government funding available to IDPs, it is important that the international community be prepared to fill assistance gaps that may jeopardize such a successful transition.

Background and main causes of displacement

In the wake of the financial crisis that hit Indonesia in 1998 and the fall of the Suharto regime the same year, religious and ethnic violence started to spread throughout the country. Against a backdrop of economic recession, widespread political discontent fuelled separatist aspirations. The resulting unrest saw more than 1.4 million people displaced between 1999 and 2002. The collapse of the Suharto regime triggered a process of political transition and democratic freedom that led to the election of President Abdurrahman Wahid in 1999 and President Megawati Sukarnoputri in July 2001. The country's first direct presidential polls took place in July 2004.

The root causes of displacement in Indonesia come from transmigration programmes undertaken under Suharto's reign which aimed to reduce demographic disparities between different regions. The relocation of large groups of populations, often from Java to less populated areas, led to growing ethnic imbalance and land disputes. These deepening tensions broke out into open conflicts when the political vacuum created by Suharto's fall triggered new local political aspirations and power struggles. At the national level, the army – traditionally a key political player – sought to assert itself during the political upheaval. Many observers have noted that, in political terms, the military has mostly gained from the eruption of violence, through reaffirming its key importance in keeping the nation united.

Separatist struggles in Aceh on the north-western tip of the island of Sumatra and in West Papua are conflicts of a different nature, rooted in the impoverishment of the local population and their perceived or real exploitation by local elites closely linked to the central government. However, transmigration programmes have also played a role in both conflicts. In Aceh, tensions between Acehnese and mainly ethnic Javanese migrants resulted in the latter group's displacement to neighbouring North Sumatra province. In West Papua, out of a total population of 2 million, 800,000 are settlers who came from Java and Sulawesi. The transfer of such a large population of a different ethnic but also religious background has created strong resentment among the local population.

Since the end of 2002, and with the exception of Aceh and Maluku province, Indonesia has experienced relative stability, leading to significant numbers of people returning in many parts of the country. From an estimated 1.3 million in mid-2002, the total number of displaced fell by more than 50 per cent to around 500,000 at the end of 2003. This significant reduction was mainly the result of more favourable conditions for return and a more effective implementation of the government's IDP policy issued in September 2001.

Crisis in Aceh continues despite lifting of martial law

While most regions of Indonesia are now conflict-free, and focus is shifting from emergency aid to long-term development assistance for returning or resettling IDPs, the situation in Aceh remains a cause for serious concern. On 18 May 2003, following the failure of last-minute talks in Tokyo and the rebels' refusal to drop their demand for independence, a major military operation was launched in Aceh; 40,000 soldiers were deployed and martial law imposed throughout the province.

This offensive put an end to a short-lived peace agreement which had only provided respite for five months. The signing of the agreement, in December 2002, raised high expectations that it could put an end to a 28-year-old conflict, which had caused some 10,000 deaths and displaced some half a million people over the last decade. Since the offensive, the province has returned to a spiral of violence, destruction and displacement, with civilians paying again the highest price.

Officially some 125,000 people have been forced from their homes so far by the fighting and forced relocation strategies employed by the army to separate the insurgents from the civilian population. In July 2003, just a month into the offensive, a peak was reached with some 90,000 displaced people in camps. Fear of being interrogated by the military in the camps and of losing their property and livestock prompted many displaced to avoid joining the lists of officially displaced. Instead they have sought refuge in the forests, unregistered camps and with relatives (JRS, 1 August 2003/PCC-Aceh, 12 June 2003).

During 2004, there has been a decline in the number of people staying in official camps and since April it appears to have stabilised at around 2,500 (OCHA, 30 April 2004, 12 June 2004). There are no reliable figures available on the number of IDPs outside the official camps, but they probably constitute the majority of the displaced (RI, 15 June 2004; OCHA, 12 June 2004). Neighbouring North Sumatra province has been a flight destination for many people fleeing the Aceh conflict since 1999. Currently there are over 100,000 IDPs spread over the province with the largest concentration living in Langkat district (OCHA April 2003, p.1). Since May 2003, the military have established checkpoints on the main roads between Aceh and North Sumatra, making it extremely difficult for people to leave the conflict-affected province (Eva-Lotta Hedman, January 2004).

Humanitarian situation and physical security

In the past year, the government has sealed off Aceh from international scrutiny by severely restricting entry for foreigners and aid agencies and strictly controlling all information flows coming out of the secessionist province (The Jakarta Post, 4 May 2004). In addition, pressure has been exerted on local humanitarian and human rights workers many of whom have been placed on "black lists" of rebel sympathisers and arrested (AI, 3 June 2004).

The military have used a strategy of forced displacement intended at separating the Free Aceh Movement (GAM) from the rest of the population, allegedly “for their own safety” (AFP, 4 June 2003). Many displaced were suddenly told to evacuate and were moved in large trucks to official camps. There have been reports of camps lacking drinking water and sanitation, and suffering from food shortages, insufficient medical services and outbreaks of contagious diseases (Eye on Aceh, April 2004; JRS, 17 April 2004). Local NGOs report that during the first five months of the offensive at least 54 IDPs died in the camps and hundreds have suffered from illnesses (Kontras, 11 December 2003).

In the absence of independent monitoring, information on the needs of Aceh's 4.2 million residents is scarce. Prior to the offensive in May 2003, livelihood assessments in the province had shown that years of conflict had disrupted the livelihoods of all civilians in Aceh with the displaced particularly affected (UN Inter-Agency Mission, 16-19 December 2002; WFP Livelihood Survey, June 2002).

Fighting since May 2003 has further aggravated the living conditions of an already fragile population, disrupting food supplies, electricity, water, schooling and access to healthcare for hundreds of thousands. The governor of Aceh has raised concern that the military operation was causing unemployment and poverty to reach alarming levels and that five months into the offensive, some 40 per cent of the population were living below the poverty line (Laksamana.net, 29 October 2003). Restrictions placed on movement, working hours, and the provision of food and other basic products, like kerosene, oil or sugar, have made it hard for people to cope with their situation (AFP, 2 October 2003).

While the government's integrated operation provided for accommodation, health care and food assistance to people displaced in official camps, there seems to have been insufficient assistance available for the rehabilitation and recovery of the displaced upon return to their homes. Most of them were able to return after relatively short stays in the camps, but often they found little left of their homes and property (Eye on Aceh, April 2004, p.10; ICG, 23 July 2003, p.5). An estimated 23,000 homes have been destroyed in Aceh since 2001. Although close to half of the houses have been rebuilt by the government up to the end of 2003 and 2,500 additional homes were planned for 2004, more than 13,000 households may be homeless as no funding has yet been secured to rebuild their homes (OCHA, 3 April 2004).

The imposition of martial law has been accompanied by a wide range of repressive measures, limiting civil liberties while giving the military a free hand in applying counter-terrorist tactics. In a guerrilla-type war where entire villages may be suspected of sympathising with the rebel movement or collaborating with the authorities, IDPs face critical threats to their safety before, during and after displacement. Since the launching of the military operation, reports of violence and abuses against civilians have emerged from various sources, including civilians who have managed to flee the province, the media, human rights organisations, and the government itself.

Based on interviews conducted with Acehnese refugees who had managed to flee to Malaysia, Human Rights Watch described violations that included extra-judicial executions, forced disappearances, arbitrary arrest and detentions, forced relocations of civilians and limits on their freedom of movement (HRW, December 2003, p.5). Due to the lack of reliable data, the number of civilian casualties is unknown, but police sources put it near 500 after only six months of fighting (HRW, April 2004, p.5). In March 2004, Komnas HAM, the National Human Rights Commission, stated in a report that it had found indications of widespread human rights violations against civilians in Aceh. Abuses perpetrated by both sides included extra-judicial killings, torture, rape and kidnapping (The Jakarta Post, 10 March 2004; Kompas, 29 August 2003).

The government reported in May 2004 that one year into the offensive, some 2,000 alleged members of GAM had been killed, 2,100 had been arrested and 1,276 had surrendered. It also acknowledged that the war in Aceh had led to numerous violations committed by the military and stated that some 511 violations had been recorded in the last 12 months (The Jakarta Post, 6 May).

As always in such conflicts, women and children are particularly at risk. There have been reports of abuses specifically directed at women, including rape and other forms of sexual violence (AI, 11 May 2004; Eye on Aceh, April 2004, pp.8-10).

National and international response

The government has often relied on the international community and in particular the UN to assist during humanitarian emergencies. Although the latter was involved in the drawing up of contingency plans prior to the offensive, the absence of experienced international humanitarian workers in the field due to the restrictions has from the start raised concern that the government, the military and the local authorities lacked the capacity to effectively deal with the humanitarian crisis. Inexperienced local governments were reportedly ill-prepared to cope with the large number of displaced, resulting in inadequate assistance (ICG, 23 July 2003, p.5; OCHA, 30 June 2003).

Since the imposition of martial law and the restrictions placed on the presence of foreigners in the province, many international organisations involved in assisting the conflict-affected population, often through local implementing partners, have pulled out or drastically scaled down their activities. Despite the lifting of martial law in May 2004, these restrictions have continued to apply and hamper the provision of international humanitarian aid to the province (OCHA, 30 June 2004). The International Committee of the Red Cross (ICRC) and some UN agencies were allowed to return to Banda Aceh in early 2004 (OCHA, 23 January 2004), but their international staff presence remains limited to the capital. Foreign staff from international NGOs are still not allowed back to the province.

The restrictions imposed on international organisations have severely limited their activities in the province. Most had to rely on national staff to keep existing programmes running. Despite these restrictions, some organisations have managed to conduct limited activities.

In response to the IDP assistance gap, a training workshop was conducted by the UN Office for the Coordination of Humanitarian Affairs in Banda Aceh in March 2004 to strengthen the provincial and district-level government bodies in charge of managing the assistance to the displaced (OCHA, 27 March 2004).

Since May 2004, the International Office for Migration (IOM) has been conducting a survey in 143 villages in 14 districts to gather information on the needs of returnees and vulnerable groups. This information will be used as a basis for government and future international humanitarian intervention (OCHA, 8 May 2004).

Return still problematic in many regions

Apart from Aceh and Maluku, where renewed violence displaced some 10,000 people in April 2004, no new significant incidents of displacement have occurred in the country since 2003. This relative stability has allowed for major returns and the lifting of the IDP status for many displaced after the reception of termination grants from the government. However, many have not received the promised assistance, either because of a lack of funds or because of misuse of that money.

Areas where return has been possible since 2003 include Central Sulawesi, North Maluku, and to a lesser extent Maluku Province and Central Kalimantan, where local hostility to the return of displaced Madurese still hampers returns. The East Timorese refugees living in West Timor and unwilling to return home have since the beginning of 2003 lost their refugee status and are offered the same resettlement options as IDPs.

In most regions, complex issues, which are vital to ensure the sustainability of returns and resettlements, remain to be addressed. These include land and property rights, housing, access to education, reconciliation between communities, protection and security and the availability of economic opportunities (OCHA & Bakornas, July 2003).

More than two years after the signing of the Malino peace agreement which put an end to three years of conflict between Christian and Muslim communities that displaced some 150,000 people, the trend in Central Sulawesi is positive, with reconstruction and rehabilitation efforts well under way. However, return has been slower than expected. This is mainly due to the persistence of tensions and occasional eruptions of violence in the province. The situation is stabilised by the presence of security forces, but many fear that violence may flare up again once they leave. The society is still very polarised between Christians and Muslims and few envisage a return to mixed communities. An estimated 90,000 people are still in need of assistance to rebuild their livelihoods. There is, however, a lack of reliable data available on this population and some are thought to have left the province (OCHA, 9 April 2004, p.15). In response to this gap, OCHA has during 2004 supported the local government to establish an IDP Database (OCHA, 30 April 2004).

Return and resettlement has been ongoing in North Maluku in the last two years and the focus of assistance is now on durable solutions and economic empowerment. Given the improved security situation, the government in May 2003 lifted the state of emergency status, which had been in place in the province for the previous three years. Some 34,000 IDPs remain there, while 13,000 IDPs from North Maluku still live in camps in North Sulawesi. A recent UN assessment mission to Bitung, North Sulawesi, revealed that the majority of IDPs did not desire to return and recommended that priority be given to the resolution of land ownership problems and economic development to make their resettlement sustainable (OCHA, 30 June 2004). From a mixed population prior to the eruption of violence, North Maluku is now becoming a more religiously divided province. Muslims are settling in Muslim communities while Christians are staying with Christians.

In April 2004, renewed violence between Christian and Muslim communities in the capital Ambon claimed the lives of 38 people and caused the displacement of some 10,000 (ICG, 17 May 2004, p.7). Since then, tension has remained high in Ambon, where invisible demarcation lines have been drawn up between the two religious communities (OCHA, 1 June 2004), adding to the already existing impediments to return. Overall, the humanitarian needs of the remaining 200,000 displaced are being met and the most pressing needs are for durable solutions and economic empowerment. Obstacles restricting return and relocation include insecurity, limited funding, lack of coordination, land ownership disputes, and the shortage of land and job opportunities at relocation sites (Bakornas & OCHA, July 2003, pp.12-13).

In East Java, some 120,000 Madurese displaced from Central Kalimantan due to ethnic tensions in 2001 have been waiting for safety and security guarantees before returning home. Limited return to some areas of Central Kalimantan occurred at the end of 2002, while some districts are still refusing such return movements. A UN assessment mission conducted in June 2004 concluded that virtually all IDPs on Madura wished to return and that they cited lack of funds as the main obstacle. Further, living conditions in camps and private housing were described as below acceptable standards (OCHA, 30 June 2004). Already in February 2003, a UN-government mission to Madura had called for increased assistance to foster food security, access to education and income-generating activities (OCHA & Bakornas, February 2003, p.3).

An estimated 28,000 East Timorese are still displaced in West Timor. Most of them are former government employees, police or soldiers and their families are unwilling to face a potentially hostile population upon return. UNHCR and the government are planning to resettle them elsewhere in the country but most are likely to relocate within West Timor (OCHA & Bakornas, July 2003).

The majority of the remaining IDPs are those who resulted from cross-provincial movements and cannot or do not want to return because of the continued hostility of the ethnic/religious groups that forced them to flee or because the conflict is still ongoing in their area of origin. It will be important to ensure that they are properly resettled or that they are assisted in integrating into the new environments where many have now lived for years. IDPs in North Sumatra, East Nusa Tenggara (West Timor) and East Java (Madura island) all need alternative solutions to a return that is often not possible in the near future. Others in North Sulawesi or in Maluku province are willing to return but require better information on their entitlements and improved coordination between the provinces.

Responsibility for assistance to IDPs shifted to the provincial authorities

Aceh apart, the government has generally acknowledged its responsibility for IDPs and shown commitment to assisting them at the various stages of displacement. In September 2001, it formulated a national policy to address the problem of internal displacement in the country, suggesting that it could be solved by the end of 2002. Most aid agencies were sceptical about the government's plans, pointing out that most of the conflicts that generated displacement had still not ended and conditions were not yet conducive for the return of all IDPs. Two years later, the deadline set for IDPs to choose between the three options contained in the national IDP policy has been enforced. Since the lifting of IDP status in early January 2004, the displaced are no longer considered as IDPs but only as "poor" or "vulnerable people" and any funding for them is to be drawn from the provincial or district budgets (OCHA & Bakornas, July 2003, p.27).

This shift has given more autonomy to the provinces in dealing with the IDP problem and will thus require the provinces to better coordinate between themselves to manage the return of cross-province IDPs. The decentralisation programme under way throughout Indonesia since 2000 and the absence of implementing guidelines issued with the national IDP policy in 2001 often resulted in considerable discrepancies between provinces in the assistance provided to the displaced. This has led to confusion among IDPs and coordination problems between provinces.

At the same time, more autonomy and devolution of responsibility to the provincial level can provide an opportunity to better integrate civil society groups and the IDPs themselves in the process. In addition, it offers an opportunity to include the rehabilitation of the returnees in long-term schemes that include and benefit the local population. This will avoid creating jealousies that undermine the reconciliation and confidence-building phase needed to avoid further eruptions of violence.

International response

The United Nations and international NGOs have helped the Indonesian government to assist the displaced since the conflicts erupted in 1999. The UN Humanitarian Coordinator, supported by OCHA, is the focal point for assistance to the IDPs and the government's direct interlocutor on IDP matters. In April 2004, after five months of delay, the UN launched a consolidated appeal requesting $43 million to implement multi-sectoral programmes to assist IDPs and other vulnerable populations in Indonesia (OCHA, 9 April 2004). The delay has reportedly affected funding for humanitarian activities with transitional activities receiving very limited funding so far. This could severely undermine the rehabilitation of the displaced who are in need of sustained assistance to recover from years of displacement. Only when the transition from emergency assistance to economic recovery and long-term sustainable development is achieved can the empowerment, relocation or return of the displaced be successful and their displacement end. With no further central government funding available to IDPs, it is important that the international community be prepared to fill assistance gaps that may jeopardize such a successful transition.

CAUSES AND BACKGROUND

Background

From the 1998 anti-Chinese ethnic riots to the spectre of national disintegration (1998-1999)

- 1998 witnessed a series of riots throughout Indonesia targeting the ethnic-Chinese minority and leading to the displacement of thousands of ethnic-Chinese Jakarta residents.
- At the end of 1999, Indonesia is confronted with the spectre of disintegration as the peripheral regions are asking for more autonomy and redistribution of the country's wealth from the national to the provincial level, like in Aceh or Irian Jaya. Other regions like East Kalimantan and Riau, also impoverished by the "internal colonialism", are asking for a more decentralized type of government.
- In the Moluccan islands, inter-community violence starting in January 1999 has escalated into a regional conflict fought along religious lines while elsewhere in Indonesia conflict between local communities and "transmigrants" have resurfaced in 1999 in West Kalimantan between the Dayaks and the Madurese.

"[...] the early months of 1998 had seen a series of riots in various parts of the Indonesian archipelago, targeting the business establishments, residences, and houses of worship of the country's ethnic-Chinese minority, and in May of that year violent riots in Jakarta and Solo led to more than one thousand deaths, dozens of rapes of ethnic-Chinese women, and the sudden flight of thousands of ethnic-Chinese Jakarta residents to safe havens elsewhere in Indonesia and overseas. Yet as predicted in the preceding reports, fears of continuing anti-Chinese rioting and violence and of a major refugee crisis proved unfounded. The latter half of 1998 saw virtually no anti-Chinese riots, and in 1999, despite widespread fears of campaign-related disturbances and violence, a peaceful election was held with little more than minor scuffles between the supporters of rival parties in the streets. The fear of riots and of anti-Chinese violence has receded into the background of Indonesian politics.

Yet as 1999 draws to a close, Indonesia is once again haunted by the spectre of "disorder", this time manifested in the threat of "disintegration" due to regional "unrest" of various kinds. Indeed, the past year has witnessed a dramatic deterioration of government authority in Aceh, and the increasingly popular assertion of demands for independence for the province. The referendum now promised, however vaguely, to the Acehnese, some commentators suggest, might also work to encourage separatist elements in Irian Jaya, where a small armed movement called Organisasi Papua Merdeka (OPM or Free Papua Organization) has long been active. Other resource-rich peripheral islands with impoverished populations resentful of Jakarta's "internal colonialism", such as Riau and East Kalimantan, have already seen rising demands for decentralization, for a more federal structure of government in Indonesia, and for a redistribution of government revenues from the national to the provincial level.

Meanwhile, inter-community violence has claimed hundreds of victims in Ambon in the Moluccan islands. Beginning in January 1999, groups of Christians and Muslims in Ambon have engaged in periodic attacks on local communities in a cycle of inter-faith violence that has yet to subside. These clashes herald the prospect of religious and "primordial" conflict elsewhere in an archipelago where tensions between Muslims and Christians, and between established local communities and newcomer "transmigrants", have been on the rise since the early 1990s. Bloody clashes between Dayaks and Madurese in West Kalimantan left hundreds dead in 1996-1997 and again in early 1999, for example, and with the recurring violence in Ambon some commentators have warned of possible communal fratricide elsewhere in the ethnically and religiously diverse Indonesian archipelago.

Indeed, the past year has seen considerable violence and social dislocation in Aceh and in Ambon, with local refugee crises displacing thousands of poor and vulnerable Indonesians. There is little evidence, moreover, of any movement towards an enduring resolution of the conflicts between the Acehnese people and the central government, or between Christians and Muslims in Ambon. More worrying still is the prospect of a backlash by the military establishment against the curtailment of its powers in recent years and the attempted assertion of military authority in Aceh, which would certainly lead to further bloodshed, suffering, and dislocation among the province's beleaguered population. " (John T. Sidel December 1999, sect. 1.2)

The challenge of regional separatism (May 2000)

- Following the fall of Suharto and the independence of East Timor, demands for regional autonomy re-emerged and gained momentum in Aceh and West Papua.
- These demands stemmed from issues like the lack of control over the designation of the political elite, the economic exploitation of regional resources by the centre, the failure to take into account the local culture and traditions and the general feeling of domination by the Jakarta elite.
- These demands triggered a debate between those who favored federalism and those who advocated for a unitary state. The latter argued that federalism was the first step to disintegration of the state. President Habibie took a middle path by introducing radical legislation in 1999 providing for wide regional autonomy within the existing unitary constitution. Authority was in principle decentralized over all fields except foreign affairs, defense and security, justice, monetary and fiscal policy, religion and a number of broad economic-policy areas including macro-developmental planning, state economic institutions, development of human and natural resources and high technology. But these new powers would be devolved to the 300 districts and not the 27 provinces. Furthermore, the regional heads - provincial governors and district heads would from now on be elected and not appointed by the central government.
- These legislative changes are likely to be insufficient for regions like Aceh and West Papua, which have been struggling for independence since the 1950's, but apart from these two regions, for which the Parliament has called for a 'special autonomy' status in 1999, the other regions don't seem to have the potential for credible independence demands.

"The prospect of national disintegration has always been a matter of anxious concern for Indonesians. The population is made up of diverse ethnic communities living in an archipelago stretching from Aceh in the West to Papua (formerly Irian Jaya) in the East. In the past it was common for ethnic communities in the Outer Islands to complain of Javanese domination and during the 1950s Jakarta faced a series of regional revolts. In several cases, Aceh and Irian Jaya, as in East Timor, armed resistance movements fought for independence. Under Soeharto's authoritarian rule, however, demands for regional autonomy were repressed. These concerns re-emerged after the fall of Soeharto and were heightened by the referendum in East Timor which stimulated demands for referenda in Aceh and Papua.

With the lifting of authoritarian constraints, demands for regional autonomy and even independence were again openly raised in other parts of the Outer Islands. Although often encapsulated as a general resentment against 'Javanese domination', the main themes included protests against the effective appointment of regional heads of government by the centre, the economic exploitation of regional resources by central interests, the failure to take account of distinctive regional cultures and traditions, and the role of the army as the ultimate guarantor of central government power. In fact the central government was by no means entirely Javanese in composition and many Outer Islanders held important positions in the central cabinet, the bureaucracy and the armed forces. It was more a case of domination by the Jakarta elite - which included both Javanese and non-Javanese - that was felt as much in the provinces of Java as it was in the Outer Islands.

The issue of regional autonomy triggered a debate between supporters of federalism and those who preferred to retain the unitary system. In the past the concept of federalism was discredited in Indonesian nationalist eyes because it had been proposed by the Dutch during the anti-colonial revolution in the late 1940s as a means to obstruct full independence. The supporters of the unitary state claimed that federalism is really a first step toward national disintegration. On the other hand, the supporters of federalism argued that the establishment of a federal system might be the only way to prevent national disintegration. The unitary state found its strongest support in Java within the nationalist PDI-P and the military while federalism had more support in the Outer Islands although the most prominent advocate of at least considering federalism was the PAN leader, Amien Rais, himself a Javanese.

Taking a middle path, the Habibie government introduced radical legislation in 1999 providing for wide regional autonomy within the existing unitary constitution. The law on regional government in principle decentralised authority over all fields except foreign affairs, defence and security, justice, monetary and fiscal policy, religion and a number of broad economic-policy areas including macro-developmental planning, state economic institutions, development of human and natural resources and high technology. The new powers, however, are not devolved to the 27 provinces but to over 300 districts throughout the country. The law explicitly envisages that the districts will be responsible for such fields as public works, health, education and culture, agriculture, communications, industry and trade, investment, the environment, land matters, cooperatives and labour. The role of provincial governments will be limited to the administration of central-government affairs in the regions, cross-district matters, and functions that the district administrations are not yet ready to handle because of the lack of trained staff. Another fundamental reform provides for the election of regional heads - provincial governors and district heads - in contrast to the practice of the Soeharto era when they were in effect appointed by the centre after transparently manipulated elections.

The extent to which the regional autonomy laws will satisfy regional demands will only be known after the implementation of the laws. However, it is clear that the autonomy laws will not be sufficient to overcome the deep resentments felt in two provinces - Aceh and Papua - where armed separatist movements have been operating for decades. In Aceh an armed resistance movement had resisted rule from Jakarta in the 1950s but had been largely subdued in the 1960s only to be revived in the late 1970s. In Papua armed rebels have conducted sporadic operations since the transfer of the territory from Dutch to Indonesian rule in 1963. The special nature of both Aceh and Papua was recognised in 1999 when the MPR called for legislation granting 'special autonomy' to the two provinces.

Apart from Aceh and Papua, no other province possesses a credible independence movement. In oil-rich Riau in Central Sumatra, local leaders have occasionally called for independence but they are urban politicians who are hardly likely to opt for armed resistance in the jungle if their demands are not met. On the contrary, the Riau leaders seem more concerned with gaining a larger share of oil revenues for their own province. In South Sulawesi, also, students have occasionally raised the independence slogan in demonstrations but their protests were usually triggered by what they saw as insults to provincial pride such as when President Habibie failed to be re-elected as president and when President Abdurrahman dismissed a prominent South Sulawesi minister from his cabinet. In other provinces, including oil-rich East Kalimantan, local demands seem to have been mitigated, at least so far, by the new laws on regional autonomy.

Despite speculation in the international press about the possible 'Balkanisation' of Indonesia, the fact is that only two provinces - Aceh with a population of 4 million and Papua with 2.5 million out of a total Indonesian population of 220 million - have separatist movements that could conceivably succeed. In both provinces popular sentiment strongly favours independence. However, in contrast to Soeharto's heavy reliance on repression, the Abdurrahman government, like the Habibie government before it, has emphasised the need for dialogue and a political approach in both provinces and hopes to reach compromises on the basis of extensive and special autonomy. Whatever the outcome of these dialogues, the prospects of Jakarta permitting either province to break away still seem remote. But even if one or both did succeed in winning independence, this need not lead to 'falling dominoes' as there are hardly any serious independence movements in other provinces." Regional governments and autonomy (March 2002)

- Since implementation of the regional autonomy in January 2002, power has been devolved to district governments with a greater control of an elected local assembly over the local executive. Concerns remain over the potential risk of violent clashes in West Kalimantan and Maluku in the forthcoming elections.
- Implementation of the regional autonomy has led to tensions between the regional governments and the central authorities. There are concerns that the central authorities will try to keep a control over the regions in the absence of effective local democratic institutions.
- Discriminatory recruiting policies favouring native applicants may lead to tensions in regions where Javanese are numerous.

"43. Regional autonomy in Indonesia has caused significant changes in local government at the provincial and district levels since implementation began on 1 January 2001. Power has been devolved to district governments in a range of sectors, with the provincial government responsible for oversight and policies that influence the province as a whole. Most significantly, accountability of provincial governors and district heads is no longer hierarchically based but through the regional parliaments allowing the exercise of local democratic control by an elected local assembly over the local executive. The mission was told that in many cases the oversight role of the parliament is dominated by corrupt practices to further political and personal interests. Moreover, competition for the position of governor and district head has been accompanied by the mobilisation of supporters of different candidates that has led to violent clashes, and the mission was told of concerns over forthcoming election in West Kalimantan and Maluku.

44. Regional autonomy has led to significant conflict between regional governments and the centre over a variety of issues, in particular the fiscal equalization scheme under regional autonomy, but without an institutional mechanism to mediate these conflicts. This is particularly important for resource-rich provinces such as Riau, where ethno-nationalistic sentiment is growing and where the province has a strong bargaining position with Jakarta. The intervention by the Minister of Home Affairs in the recent sacking of the Mayor of Surabaya by the local parliament, and the reported intention of the President to have power under certain circumstances to dissolve regional parliaments has led many to conclude that central government is seeking to regain control over the regions in the absence of effective local democratic institutions.

45. Regional autonomy has also been accompanied by new policies and rules that are discriminatory, including the issue of 'putra daerah' (literally translated as 'sons of the region') in which civil servants from a particular region are given preference for jobs over non-native applicants. This may create problems for the many Javanese civil servants working in regional governments who are presently protected from being dismissed by regional governments, and lead to increasing ethnic tensions." The political role of local elites and the manipulation of ethnic identities (2002)

- Dr. van Klinken suggests that similar to what happened in Central Kalimantan, local elites in other conflict-affected areas of the country have played an important role in the building of an ethnic discourse and the stimulation of ethnic conflicts with the objective to deflect democracy and gain access to local leadership.

All over Indonesia, post-New Order political violence is taking ethnic forms. The Indonesian discourse (inappropriately) calls this 'horizontal violence.' Everywhere the question is asked: What has happened to the Indonesia we thought we knew? The Central Kalimantan vignette suggests we should look for an answer among local elites, who seem to be playing new roles in an unfamiliar script.

Similar vignettes could be drawn from West Kalimantan, Maluku, Poso in Central Sulawesi, Papua or Aceh (the latter two even less 'horizontal' than the others). Even where there has been little or no violence, local elites, from Flores to Gorontalo, from Minahasa and Banten to Riau, are building an exclusive discourse of ethnicity such as has not been heard so publicly in Indonesia before.

One strong perspective on these elites and their constituencies is offered by Jack Snyder. Under certain circumstances (but not others), ethnic conflict or ultra-nationalism can break out as countries emerge from an authoritarian regime. The democratic space that opens up is then occupied less by true democrats than by anti-democratic elites, who manipulate ethnic sentiment in order to deflect popular demands for democracy. Democratisation is likely to fail under circumstances where democratic institutions are weak and where elites are not adaptable to democracy. Serbia, which gave the world the term 'ethnic cleansing', is an obvious example, and Snyder includes a chapter on this country's history before World War I.

When Snyder traces ethnic conflict in transitional situations to anti-democratic elites who take advantage of weak institutional controls, he is taking positions in at least two broader theoretical debates, one on the nature of politicised ethnicity, and another on the political role of elites. In both these debates his positions are at variance with those often taken either in the Indonesianist literature or at least the mass media hitherto.

On the issue of politicised ethnicity, the view still most commonly heard in the mass media (though now rarely in the scholarly literature) is the primordialist one, in which ethnicity is an ancient and fundamental reality. Over against this view, instrumentalists such as Snyder see ethnicity as something much more flexible and subject to (re) invention by elite opinion-makers. In the same spirit, for example, Paul Brass has written a brilliant description of the way such elites in India manipulate ethnic feeling to promote communal violence at certain moments critical for their own needs.

Snyder also takes a position on the political role of elites. The theoretical literature here is broadly divided between functionalists, who view them as a natural part of any social system and essential to its proper functioning, and Marxians/ Weberians, who view them as essentially parasitic. Elites have always played a central role in the study of the strongly hierarchical societies of Southeast Asia. In the past, the functionalist view has dominated, also in Indonesianist literature. Using the language of integration rather than of conflict, elites were represented as the best to which a society gives birth. Modernisation, and lately democratisation, were good things being done by enlightened middle class elites.

However the alternative view, of elites less as society's best servants than as its worst exploiters, experienced a remarkable resurgence in Indonesia following the 1998 crisis. Tim Lindsey, for example, wrote in 2000 that 'elite bad faith' had torpedoed legal reform. They had conducted their real business in a 'shadow system' behind the scenes, and with their military friends had turned Indonesia into a 'black state.' This was by no means an extreme view. The orthodox American free-marketeering opinion of the 1997-98 Indonesian economic crisis was that it was caused by Suharto's cronyism. Even inside the country, exasperation with the 'power elite' was almost the main theme of Indonesian newspaper headlines in the months before Megawati Sukarnoputri finally replaced President Abdurrahman Wahid on 23 July 2001.

The image of parasitic elites who deflect democratisation by stimulating ethnic conflict provides a leitmotif for our inquiry into Indonesia's new ethnic elites. However, it is important to add one more dimension to our inquiry, namely that these are local elites and not national ones. They are not competing for the ultimate prize of national leadership, but for local leadership - at the level of the province. They are 'subaltern' elites, who need to maintain relations upwards, in the capital, as well as downwards, among their chosen constituencies. (van Klinken, 2002, pp. 1-3)

Communal violence in the Maluku islands

Basic facts about the Maluku islands

"The Maluku archipelago is located in the eastern part of Indonesia, and consists of 1208 islands. It is located between latitudes 3°N and 0.8°S and longitudes 124 and 135°W. In area, it is the largest province of Indonesia, covering some 850,000 km², of which only some 10% constitutes land area.

The population in 1999 was just over two million - less than 1% of the total population of Indonesia - of which more than 830,000 in North Maluku.

The Maluku inhabitants are followers of three major religions: Islam (59%), Christian Protestant (35.5%), and Catholic (5%).

In October 1999, the then Maluku province was divided into two provinces, North Maluku with its capital in Ternate and Maluku with Ambon as its capital. North Maluku Province has yet to be fully functional, since it has not elected its provincial parliament (scheduled for June 2000 followed by election of governor), nor established other government agencies. Previously, Maluku was administratively divided into four districts (Southeast Maluku, Central Maluku, Central Halmahera and North Maluku) and one municipality, the city of Ambon.

The land of the Maluku islands is fertile and Maluku is still a main producer of spices in Indonesia and the sea is rich of fish and other seafood. The Moluccans mostly work as farmers, fishermen and in wood industry, mining and on plantations as well as for the government as civil servants. They are considered by others to be easy-going and friendly but with a strong temperament.

Since the independence of Indonesia, the population of Maluku has significantly increased, especially through the influx of migrants coming from Buton Island in the neighboring province of South-East Sulawesi, and the Bugis and Makassar from South Sulawesi as well as those coming from Java and Sumatra. The migration has largely been spontaneous, but some migrants have arrived as part of the national transmigration programme.

Up to now, the highest concentration of economic activities has been in Ambon Island (about 761 km²) or only less than 1% of the total land area of Maluku. Ambon City is the center for industry, trade, education, tourism, and has a relatively dense population of 330,000 or some 15% of the total Maluku population.

Before the arrival of the colonialism (Portuguese and Dutch), the majority of the population were Muslims. During the colonial period, the number of Christians significantly increased. The principle of equality for all was instituted at the time of independence, giving an equal opportunity for all to get an education, in work opportunity and to start a business." (UNDP March 2000, p. 3)

Background to the conflict (1950-1998)

- Population of indigenous Ambonese since the sixteenth century has been relatively evenly divided between Christians and Muslims.
- Tension between Muslims and Christians in Maluku province had been growing for decades.
- Factors contributing the degradation of community relationship include the war in 1950 between the government and the Christian-led RMS and the steady influx of migrants from other parts of Indonesia resulted in the establishment of new settlements outside the traditional alliance system.
- In 1974, local leadership was gradually transformed from a clan-based system to a territorially based system of village heads.

"Ambon is the name of a city and an island, and the term 'Ambonese' describes a cultural area that embraces many of the islands in the district of Central Maluku, Maluku province, Indonesia. Those islands include Ambon, Saparua, Haruku, Buru, Manipa, Nusalaut, and Ceram. The population of indigenous Ambonese since the sixteenth century has been relatively evenly divided between Christians and Muslims. For the most part, the two live in separate negerior villages, and even within mixed villages, they tend to live in separate kampungs or neighborhoods. In addition, many ethnic Butonese migrants from southeast Sulawesi, a large island to the west of Ambon, and ethnic Bugis and Makassarese, from south Sulawesi, have settled in their own kampungs. These migrants are overwhelmingly Muslim, and they dominate small-scale retail trading and transportation networks.

Tension between Muslims and Christians in Maluku province had been growing for decades, the result of the declining influence of traditional authority mechanisms; the influx of migrants; and the "greening" or perceived Islamicization of the central government in Jakarta. The outbreaks of communal violence elsewhere in Indonesia in the aftermath of President Soeharto's resignation in May 1998 served to heighten distrust between the two communities.

Both the pela alliance system and the authority of traditional local leaders, called raja, had been undermined long before the current conflict erupted. The pela system had received a fatal blow at the time of Indonesian independence in 1949, when a largely Christian political elite, many with military or administrative ties to the Dutch colonial administration, opted to establish the Republic of the South Moluccas (RMS), rather than join the new Indonesian state. A brief war ensued which the RMS lost in December 1950. In the course of the conflict, many Muslim villages were razed by RMS forces, and the destruction was not forgotten. In addition to the war, a steady influx of migrants from other parts of Indonesia resulted in the establishment of new settlements that were completely outside the pela system, which applied only to Ambonese Christians and Muslims.

In 1974, with the passage of a new law on local government, local leadership was gradually transformed from a clan-based system, represented by the Ambonese raja, to a territorially based system of village heads, the lowest rung on the Indonesian administrative ladder. In one sense, the new system was more egalitarian, because it opened up the possibility that migrant communities of ethnic Bugis, Butonese, and Makassarese could be represented, and some candidates for village head appealed to these communities for votes. On the other hand, it meant that many of the village heads lacked the authority the old raja had enjoyed, and when conflict broke out, there were fewer people at a local level with the ability to stop it.

The migrant influx also tipped the demographic balance in favor of Muslims. Migrants from Sulawesi had been coming to trade in Ambon since the sixteenth century, but migration picked up sharply in the 1970s, and with it, increasing tension with the Ambonese population. Ethnic Bugis, who had traditionally settled along the coast in self-contained communities, began to settle in the city of Ambon, displacing other traders, taking over the transportation sector, and in the view of some Ambonese, creating slum areas and contributing to urban crime. Bugis also began to make themselves felt politically in the 1980s and 90s, with tightly organized Bugis associations that local politicians ignored at their peril. Their political rise coincided with what Ambonese Christians saw as an affirmative action policy undertaken by the national government in the early 1990s to redress the marginalization of Muslim entrepreneurs in comparison to their ethnic Chinese competitors. Whatever the rationale for this policy in Muslim majority areas, in Ambon it created anger and frustration among Christians, as they saw not just economic opportunities but also civil service jobs going more and more to Muslims, many of them migrants. As Christians were eased out of the positions they had traditionally held in the local government, teaching profession, and police, they turned to the private sector, only to find that migrant groups from Sulawesi, among others, had sewn up the market. Christians began to feel that their political, economic, and cultural existence in Ambon was threatened.

Communal relations, then, were not good, even before the violence erupted, and everyone we talked to in Ambon spoke of regularly recurring fights between Muslim and Christian kampungs. The neighborhoods seemed to live in a state of barely repressed hostility, but the frequent fights were quickly settled.

The atmosphere, however, changed perceptibly for the worse after a series of possibly provoked communal incidents broke out elsewhere in Indonesia in late 1998. On November 22, 1998, a dispute between local gangs over a gambling establishment, at which Christian Ambonese acted as security guards, turned into a communal riot as rumors spread that the Ambonese had destroyed a local mosque, and Muslims youths trucked into the area then burned some two dozen churches. On November 30, a Christian youth congress in Kupang, West Timor, held a congress, followed by a march, to protest the church-burnings. In the middle of the march, a truckload of youths appeared whom no one seemed to know, and in no time an ethnic Bugis neighborhood, including the mosque, was burned to the ground.

Both incidents were widely believed to have been provoked by the military, because the army in particular was perceived to be the beneficiary of civil unrest: a traumatized population might see the army, rather than a democratically elected government as Indonesia might have next June, as the only guarantor of security. The local government warned religious leaders around the country, as Christmas and the Muslim fasting month approached in December 1998, to be on alert for provocation and to resist being influenced by rumors.

One meeting of religious leaders was held in Ambon in mid-December. The atmosphere was so tense, according to one participant, that the Muslims left convinced that the Christians had decided that the only way to address the problem was to rid the province of Muslim migrants. Leaders of both communities set up "posko," an acronym defined either as "communication post" or "command post" depending on the militancy of the definer. These posts, with networks of mosques and churches connected by cell phone or regular telephone, were intended to alert the respective communities to any danger of provocation. In fact, once a fight broke out, they served as much to spread rumors and mobilize communities." (HRW March 1999, sect. II)

Conflict and large-scale displacement hit the Maluku provinces (1999-2002)

- Fighting in Ambon started in January 1999 and rapidly spread to the rest of the province. Casualties of the civil war were as high as 5,000-10,000 and at least 700,000 people fled their homes. Although the level of violence has declined since and some IDPs have been able to return, in particular the Muslim IDPs in North Maluku, tensions remains high in Ambon and surroundings islands.

- The arrival of the Islamic Laskar Jihad and several thousands fighters in mid-2000 aggravated the conflict, inflicting high casualties on the Christian side and forcing thousands to flee. A civil emergency was imposed on Maluku and North Maluku in June 2000. By early 2001, most of the fighting had subsided and the provinces were partitioned between Christian and Muslim communities.
- Laskar Jihad seem to have shifted from direct attacks on Christian villages to more involvement in religious and social welfare activities in Maluku.
- Its has been suggested that continuing emergency conditions give security personnel lucrative opportunities and that they may have a hand in the low level violence that continues to prevail in Maluku.
- The main obstacle to peace seems to be still limited trust between the two communities. Furthermore, the Muslim demand that those masterminding the violence (supposedly the Christians) be prosecuted while the Christians see the presence of Laskar Jihad as an obstacle to peace.

"The fighting that broke out between Christians and Muslims in Ambon, the capital of Indonesia's Maluku province, on 19 January 1999 triggered a virtual civil war that soon spread to other parts of the province. At least 5,000 people (perhaps as many as 10,000) have been killed and close to 700,000 – almost one-third of the population of 2.1 million – became refugees. Peace has yet to be achieved although violence has declined sharply during the last year. Refugees are beginning to return to predominantly Muslim North Maluku (which was separated from the old Maluku province in September 1999) but tensions remain high in Ambon and surrounding islands that are the core of the new Maluku province.

During the initial phase, each side inflicted heavy casualties. But in mid-2000 there was a qualitative change when a Java-based fundamentalist Islamic militia, Laskar Jihad, responding to the perception that Muslims were getting the worst of it, sent several thousand fighters to Ambon. They had received basic military training from a small group of sympathetic officers within the Indonesian National Military (TNI – Tentara Nasional Indonesia) and were supplied with modern weapons after their arrival in Maluku.

Supported by elements in the security forces, the Laskar Jihad put the Christian militias on the defensive, inflicted casualties on the Christian community and forced thousands of Christians to flee, causing the national government to impose a civil emergency in the two Maluku provinces in June 2000. Although Muslim offensives continued, by early 2001 the level of violence was declining and most of the population had been partitioned into Christian and Muslim zones.

The security forces failed dismally to contain the conflict during the first eighteen months partly because they were hamstrung by the competing sympathies many Christian and Muslim personnel felt for co-religionists. After the introduction of the civil emergency, however, the military adopted a new strategy involving establishment of a Joint Battalion (Yon Gab – Batalyon Gabungan), a centralised mobile reserve drawn from elite forces of the three services that could be sent quickly to conflict areas. In a context where Muslim militias – backed by Laskar Jihad and some military and police personnel – were gaining ground, the Yon Gab found itself usually confronting Muslim forces and soon gained a pro-Christian reputation.

The Yon Gab appears to have contributed to the decline in fighting but credible allegations about the brutality of some of its members besmirched its reputation and aggravated Muslim antagonism. In November 2001 it was withdrawn and replaced by army special forces (Kopassus).

In contrast to North Maluku and the southeast part of the Maluku province, shootings and bomb explosions continue on Ambon and nearby islands although attacks on Christian villages and direct armed confrontations are now rare. Laskar Jihad is less openly involved in launching direct attacks on Christians and seems to be concentrating more on religious and social-welfare activities in Maluku although it continues to provide military training and has sent fighters to Poso in South Sulawesi.

Laskar Jihad and another, smaller and more secretive, Muslim militia, the Laskar Mujahidin, have been suspected of links to terrorist organisations outside Indonesia including Al-Qaeda though ICG has found no strong evidence suggesting a significant foreign connection to the troubles in Maluku. In addition, military and police deserters – Christian and Muslim – appear to be involved in occasional attacks. On the Christian side, youth gangs are ready to retaliate if the violence rises. Local speculation suggests that some elements in the security forces tolerate, or even support, a low level of continuing violence in order to induce property-owners to pay protection money. Continuing emergency conditions also give security personnel other lucrative opportunities.

During the last year there have been signs that at least some Muslims are losing enthusiasm for Laskar Jihad. In the past Maluku's Muslims have not been especially attracted to "fundamentalist" movements, and most do not identify closely with Laskar Jihad. However, many are grateful for its role in fending off Christian militias. Muslims lack confidence in the security forces to maintain order and fear that Laskar Jihad's withdrawal would leave them vulnerable to revenge attacks. However, Christian leaders see its presence as the key obstacle to a more permanent peace.

An effective peace agreement still seems far off in Ambon where Muslim leaders and Laskar Jihad are convinced that the Christian side started the fighting and demand that its leaders apologise on behalf of their community and the brains behind the conflict be prosecuted. Christians are equally convinced that Muslims started the conflict. They also have only limited confidence in the TNI's capacity to protect them.

The government's main priority is to ensure that large scale fighting does not resume. To preserve the present "peace", it is essential that the security forces behave in a professional and neutral manner. In Maluku, however, the reality is that local forces, both the military and especially the police, are highly vulnerable to "contamination", partisan alignment with their own religious community. Although Yon Gab contributed to the decline in violence during 2001, its brutal excesses alienated Muslims. The force that replaced it has yet to win the confidence of both communities.

In North Maluku return to "normalcy" is much more advanced, partly because the Muslim majority is too large to feel threatened politically. Although some of the worst massacres took place on Halmahera in North Maluku, it is now increasingly possible for refugees to return. The security forces are needed to prevent revenge attacks but it is hoped that a "natural" reconciliation process can take place.

In Maluku, especially Ambon, government and military emphasise that reconciliation should not be "forced" and should proceed "naturally". This means the partition of Ambon and other regions into Christian and Muslim zones will not be ended soon. But the longer partition lasts, the harder reconciliation will be. Meanwhile, limited steps have been taken to provide more opportunities for the communities to meet naturally such as establishment of markets in "neutral" areas of Ambon where Christian and Muslims can intermingle. The Baku Bae (reconciliation) movement has sponsored informal meetings between leaders. However, these initiatives are still in early stages, and there is no expectation that natural reconciliation will be achieved quickly.

In January 2002, the national government persuaded leaders of both communities to participate in a peace conference the following month but the gap between the sides remains wide, and the search for peace is far from over." (ICG 8 February 2002, p. i-ii)

Reconciliation and peace efforts (September 2003)

- State of emergency in the Maluku was lifted in September 2003
- Despite continued opposition to the peace agreement by some groups, the situation in the Maluku has reportedly improved since February.
- A peace agreement was signed in Malino on 12 February 2002 between Christians and Muslims from the Maluku to put an end to the conflict

State of emergency lifted in the Maluku

"Indonesia on Monday revoked a three-year state of emergency in the eastern Maluku islands, where clashes between Muslims and Christians have left more than 5,000 people dead.

Home Affairs Minister Hari Sabarno announced the end of the emergency during the inauguration of the new governor of Maluku province, Karel Albert Ralahalu, in the city of Ambon.

Sabarno said troops sent into the archipelago following the sectarian violence would be withdrawn gradually.

'They still have a lot of work to do in other places,' Sabarno said.

The minister said he hoped the improving security in the region would lure business on Maluku and North Maluku provinces in June 2000 after Muslim-Christian violence erupted in Ambon and spread to other islands. The emergency in North Maluku was lifted in May.

Under the civilian emergency, the governor held the supreme command over the military and the police, and had the power to stop people from entering the province or any particular area, to ban public meetings and to censor press reports." (AFP 15 September 2003)

Malino peace accord signed but some militant groups oppose it

"Peace remains elusive in Maluku province as a number of militant groups continue to oppose the Malino peace accord, which was mediated by the government last month to end the three-year-old sectarian conflict.

Maluku Governor Saleh Latuconsina told the media over the weekend that although most of the feuding parties had accepted the 11-point agreement, a small number of groups still opposed it and had launched a campaign to persuade other people to reject it. "As a matter of fact, there are still people who do not approve of the agreement. I hope that people here do not rest on their laurels," he said.

Overall, however, the situation in the province has been gradually improving since the Malino agreement, which was reached last month between 35 Muslim delegates and 35 Christian delegates in Malino, 70 kilometers from Makassar, the capital of South Sulawesi province.

Maluku Military Commander, Mustopo said that 80 percent of the people of Maluku had accepted the Malino peace pact and only 20 percent oppose it. "That's our conclusion based on our field research," he said, without identifying the opponents.

Since the peace accord was signed on Feb. 12, several hardline groups have voiced their refusal through, among other things, demonstrations in the provincial capital. They include the Maluku Front of Muslim Defenders under Husni Putuhena, the Special Task Force of Amar Maruf Nahi Munkar under Muhamad Attamimi, Brig. Gen. (ret.) Rustam Kastor, Ustad Bahasoan and Laskar Jihad Ahlussunah Wal Jamaah." (The Jakarta Post 11 March 2002)

"On February 11-12, 2002, the Indonesian Government, led by Coordinating Minister for People's Welfare Mr. Jusuf Kalla, convened and mediated a meeting between the opposing Christian and Muslim factions from Indonesia's Moluccas province (which was known as the 'Spice Islands' during Dutch colonial rule) in Malino, South Sulawesi. After two days of intense heart-to-heart talks, the two parties in conflict reached an agreement to end the three-year bloodshed, and to work together to maintain peace in the Moluccas. The Agreement was signed by the two sides comprising of thirty-five Christian and thirty-five Muslim delegates." (Government of Indonesia, 14 February 2002)

Chronology of major incidents and peace efforts in Maluku, The Jakarta Post, 14 February 2002

Situation in the Maluku stabilised, but tension remains high after April's new eruption of violence (June 2004)

- 5 weeks after the eruption of violence that killed 40 people, destroyed 847 houses and displaced 10,000, the situation in Ambon remained tense.
- On 25 April a ceremony commemorating the 54th anniversary of the founding of the Republic of the South Moluccas triggered violence in Ambon city for several days.
- In the 2 years before the April 2004 renewed violence, Ambon city had known some isolated bomb incidents but they did not trigger further violence or conflicts and the situation had become more stable and conducive to finding durable solutions for IDPs.

"The situation in Ambon city remained tense five weeks after the violent confrontations between Muslims and Christians that shook Ambon City in late April. The violence left 40 people dead and over 300 people injured. Several bombs exploded in public places while police defused a number of unexploded bombs. Muslim and Christian communities have drawn invisible demarcation lines dividing Ambon city along the religious lines. The Government has reported some 10,000 newly displaced people while the Indonesian Red Cross (PMI) put this number at 4,000 IDPs. Many of these people have been displaced for a number of times and lost their belongings time and again, and will continue relying on the assistance programmes for some time to come. According to Maluku Governor's report to Jakarta, at least 847 housing units (589 unit belonging to recent returnees) and 4 schools including a UNDP funded reconciliation school were destroyed or badly damaged." (OCHA 1 June 2004)

"The city of Ambon, in Maluku (Moluccas), which had been relatively quiet for two years, erupted in violence on 25 April 2004 after a small group of independence supporters held a ceremony commemorating the 54th anniversary of the founding of the Republic of the South Moluccas (Republik Maluku Selatan, RMS).

As of 5 May, the death toll had reached 38, about two-thirds of whom were Muslim. The fact that many were killed by sniper fire has led to a widespread belief that the violence was provoked. Two churches, a Muslim high school, the office of UN humanitarian agencies, and hundreds of homes were set on fire. Close to 10,000 people have been displaced from their homes, adding to the some 20,000 displaced during earlier phases of the conflict who remain unable to return to their original dwellings. (The newly displaced were all from the city of Ambon; the 20,000 figure is for Ambon island, including the city. Several observers noted that the longer term displaced, many of them unemployed youth, provide a ready pool of recruits for violence.) Until 5 May, the deaths and arson had been confined to Ambon city; religious and community leaders had kept many previously hardhit communities elsewhere on the island and in the central Moluccan archipelago from exploding, a tribute to the reconciliation efforts over the last two years. But that day, gunmen killed two people on Buru island, and there have subsequently been isolated outbreaks elsewhere, although the city itself has returned to a tense calm. The longer it takes to uncover the perpetrators of this latest round of violence, the greater the danger of a new eruption." (ICG 17 May 2004, p. 1)

"Over the last two years, the situation has become more stable and conducive to finding durable solutions for IDPs. While some isolated bomb incidents continued, they did not trigger further violence or conflicts. The apparent shift in atmosphere, from tension and fear to hope and optimism for stability and peace, is strengthened by the decline in the number of communal revenge attacks and violence as a result of security incidents, and replacement in Ambon City of military check posts by mobile patrols consisting of special military and police personnel. Initiatives to organise joint meetings and sports events/activities between religious groups have been intensified with the help of international humanitarian organisations to facilitate dialogue among deeply divided communities. In a Presidential Decree number 71/2003, as of 15 September 2003, the three years old "Civil Emergency Status" of Maluku has finally been lifted, which clearly indicates the improved security situation in the province and may encourage more returns." Struggle for independence in Aceh

Renewed independence aspirations after Suharto's resignation (1998-1999)

- In the context of the the Reformasi movement , the fall of Suharto and the political liberalization in 1998, aspirations for change and social justice in Aceh grew stronger. In August 1998, the military operation status of the province was terminated and promises were made to demilitarize Aceh. Following incident at the end of the month, promises appeared to be more difficult to fulfill.
- In early 1999, Acehnese students initiated a campaign for a referendum on Aceh's political status and while the initiative was gaining ground through the province, GAM intensified its activities to undermine the authority of the local government.
- The violent military response to these claims further contributed to undermine the local authorities as well as the prospect of resolving the province's problems in the framework of an unitary Indonesian state.
- The election of Abdurrahman Wahid and Megawati Soekarnoputri to the presidency and vice-presidency, in October 1999, contributed to renewed hope and dynamism in the struggle for independence. Demonstrations and pro-independence rallies brought the province to a virtual standstill in November.
- By the end of 1999, the new president hadn't made any clear decision about Aceh's future and although he reiterated the idea of the referendum he didn't set any timeframe to it. Negotiations were undertaken with the leaders of GAM but with no tangible results. Other undertakings included a parliamentary investigation in the human rights abuses committed by the TNI during the DOM period.

"[...] the emergence of the Reformasi movement in early 1998, the resignation of President Suharto in late May of that year, and the subsequent period of political liberalization and uncertainty under the transitional Habibie administration heralded the possibility of momentous change in Aceh. Human rights activists and assorted civilian groups grew more vocal in their demands for the prosecution of human rights abuses under the Suharto regime, and revelations of atrocities in Aceh were widely published and aired by the media both in Jakarta and in Aceh itself. In August 1998, the then Armed Forces Commander-in-Chief and Defence Minister General Wiranto announced the termination of Aceh's status as a Daerah Operasi Militer and promised to withdraw extra-territorial troops from the province. Yet following a riot in the city of Lhokseumawe on 31 August in which local residents stoned TNI troops, the process of demilitarization in Aceh slowed considerably, and progress towards the prosecution of human rights cases against military offenders ground to a virtual halt.

Frustrated by the lack of substantive change on the ground in Aceh, and emboldened by the climate of political liberalization in Jakarta, the moves towards a referendum for East Timor, and the forthcoming national elections, Acehnese student activists who had mobilized in early 1998 behind the banner of Reformasi and in support of the removal of Suharto rechannelled their energies in new directions in early 1999. In late January 1999, for example, Acehnese student activists initiated a campaign for a referendum on Aceh's political status, which rapidly gained support throughout the troubled province. Meanwhile, the guerrilla forces of the GAM had stepped up their activities, and the authority of the central government in Aceh began to crumble, as suggested by the overwhelming success of the campaign to boycott the national elections in June.

The predictably inept and violent reaction of the TNI to these trends in Aceh further contributed to the deterioration of local support for the government and local faith in the prospects for reform within the framework of Indonesia. On 3 May 1999 TNI troops killed more than 40 persons when they fired on pro-independence demonstrators, and on 23 July security forces massacred more than 50 Acehnese in an attack on a religious school in West Aceh. The following month security officials announced plans for renewed counterinsurgency operations in Aceh, while in Jakarta military representatives in the national parliament initiated legislation that would allow for the declaration of a state of emergency and martial law powers in provinces suffering from severe security problems.

In the context of these deteriorating conditions and ominous signs of further violence, the election of Abdurrahman Wahid and Megawati Soekarnoputri to the presidency and vice-presidency, respectively, in late October 1999 provided the occasion for renewed mobilization in support of independence in Aceh. On 28 October, for example, tens of thousands of marchers and convoys of cars, trucks, mini-buses, and motorcycles converged on Banda Aceh, the provincial capital, and other locations in a massive demonstration demanding a referendum and independence for Aceh. On 8 November, moreover, a pro-referendum and pro-independence rally in Aceh drew an estimated two million supporters and brought the province to a standstill. In Aceh, the dramatic effect of this rally was immediately palpable, as indicated by reports that government functions in the province had virtually ceased and pronouncements by members of the local assembly in the province, the vice-governor, and even the provincial governor in favour of a referendum for Aceh.

Meanwhile in Jakarta, tension over the central government's policy towards Aceh intensified in the course of November and December, with little sign of resolution of the problem as the end of 1999 drew near. On the one hand, President Wahid made repeated offers of a referendum for Aceh, and, while remaining characteristically vague and evasive with regard to the timing of the referendum and the options to be provided in it, initiated moves towards negotiations with various Acehnese groups, including the leadership of GAM. While civilian figures like the DPR speaker and Golkar chief, Akbar Tanjung, and the MPR speaker and leader of Partai Amanat Nasional (PAN or National Mandate Party), Amien Rais, criticized Wahid for exceeding his brief and made equally vague statements with regard to the prospects for a referendum, they followed Wahid in calling for a peaceful resolution of the problems in Aceh and initiated a parliamentary investigation into human rights abuses in Aceh which led to hearings in which high-ranking active and retired TNI officers were summoned to provide testimony.

On the other hand, various statements by ranking security officials and manoeuvres by forces on the ground indicated that the TNI had not abandoned their heavy-handed approach to separatist aspirations and activities in Aceh. TNI officers, both retired and active, have been quoted as opposing a referendum - or independence - for Aceh, and, more generally, the various proposals for greater local autonomy or federalism presented by various civilian political figures. Moreover, high-ranking security officials including the Co-ordinating Minister for Political and Security Affairs, General Wiranto, have called for a declaration of a state of emergency in Aceh and for a military crackdown in the province. Meanwhile, in some areas of Aceh, TNI troops have responded to the increasingly openly hostile climate with wanton acts of violence against the local population.

As 1999 draws to a close, no peaceful resolution of the conflict in Aceh appears to be on the horizon. Demands for a referendum have won enormous popular support in Aceh, leading to a highly effective campaign of civil disobedience and a virtual implosion of government authority in the province. By most accounts, only a referendum which included the option of independence would be acceptable to the Acehnese population in the current climate, and if such a referendum were held, an overwhelming vote in favour of independence would be most likely. Adoption of the policy favoured by the TNI would entail a declaration of a state of emergency in Aceh and martial law in the province as a justification for a harsh crackdown on the streets and counterinsurgency operations in the hinterlands. If the past is any guide, such policies are likely to lead to considerable human rights abuses, large numbers of casualties, tremendous human suffering and social dislocation, as well as an even further hardening of local sentiments against the central government and in favour of independence for Aceh." (John T. Sidel December 1999, sect. 2.2)

Fighting and human rights abuses force people to flee (1999-2001)

- 1999 witnessed large-scale displacement of Acehnese in Aceh following intense repression by the military and the police as well as clashes between the security forces and GAM. Most displaced remained within the province and sought refuge in mosques and schools. The number of IDPs dramatically increased in the months preceding the general election of October 1999 with people fleeing both GAM and the military.
- In February 2000, sweeping operations by the police and military led Acehnese to flee their homes.
- In May 2000, GAM and the Indonesian authorities agreed on a "humanitarian pause" (opposed by the military). On June 1, one day before the pause was to take effect, more than 6,000 people fled their homes in North Aceh because of continued fighting.
- Although globally ineffective in stopping the violence, an extension of the humanitarian pause was signed in January 2001.

"In 1999, large numbers of Acehnese began fleeing their homes in response to brutality by the military and police, or out of fear of being caught up in clashes between the security forces and GAM. Although some Acehnese—particularly those with financial means—fled outside of Aceh (often to Medan), most remained inside, usually in camps that formed around mosques and school compounds. The months preceding Indonesia's general election in October 1999 saw a dramatic increase in the number of internally displaced persons, not only because of the violence but because some GAM members reportedly ordered Acehnese to leave their homes and set up camps to avoid being forced by the military to vote. The Acehnese may therefore have feared both the military and GAM. Some villagers sought to avoid both by fleeing to the forests and mountains.

January 2000 saw mounting pressure on Indonesia's new president, Wahid, to end the violence and human rights abuses in Aceh and to hold trials for those accused of atrocities. Although prior to his election he had publicly supported an East Timor-like referendum in Aceh (allowing a choice between autonomy within Indonesia or independence), once in office he asserted that the referendum should only address whether Aceh should be governed by Sharia (Islamic law).

In February 2000, GAM's military commander in Aceh, Tenguku Abdullah Syafi'ie, publicly announced the rebels' willingness to negotiate a cease-fire if the army and police discontinued "sweeping" operations in Aceh (operations that include roadblocks, door-to-door searches, and other techniques ostensibly to locate GAM members but also reportedly used to intimidate civilians and extort money). Many displaced Acehnese have said that such operations, or even rumors that such would begin in their villages, led them to flee their homes.

That same month, the military and police launched the latest in a series of post-DOM operations in Aceh. As the deaths and disappearances of human rights activists began to increase (and as the bodies of the dead showed signs of torture), international NGOs increased their calls for impartial investigations. In mid-February, General Wiranto was removed from his new post as security minister for his alleged role in military-sponsored human rights abuses in East Timor.

April 17, 2000 marked the beginning of long-anticipated human rights trials of 24 soldiers and one civilian for their roles in a July 1999 massacre in Aceh. The trials were conducted by a joint civil-military court (to the dismay of many Acehnese and some international human rights groups). More than 1,000 soldiers were sent to safeguard the proceedings because of an increase in arson attacks and bombings in the area. The eventual outcome was a guilty verdict for all 25 suspects and a sentence of eight to ten years in prison—a sentence regarded as too light by much of Aceh's population.

Wahid announced in early May 2000 that his government and GAM's leadership (based in Sweden) had reached an agreement on a "humanitarian pause" to the violence in Aceh. Agreement was reached during talks in Geneva facilitated by the Henri Dunant Foundation. The pause, strongly opposed by the Indonesian military, was to commence on June 2 for an initial period of three months and be regularly reviewed for renewal.

The day before the pause was to take effect, more than 6,000 Acehnese reportedly fled their homes in North Aceh because of continued fighting. The next day, the leader of a splinter GAM faction was shot at point blank range in a restaurant in the Malaysian capital of Kuala Lumpur. GAM accused military intelligence agents of the murder, and the military cast blame on GAM. In the second week of June, as prospects of a genuine cease-fire seemed grim, Wahid dismissed the governor of Aceh and replaced him with a senior minister viewed by many Acehnese as condoning human rights abuses in the region.

The following months saw continuing sweeping operations in Aceh as well as ongoing clashes causing displacement and general unrest. The new governor said authorities had been unable to implement the truce since they had not received the funds earmarked for humanitarian assistance. Both Wahid and GAM leaders proposed an extension of the pause to allow assistance to reach the internally displaced persons.

Despite charges by Indonesia's defense minister that the humanitarian pause is "too advantageous" to GAM, in late September the two sides signed an extension of the agreement through January 15, 2001 (the pause formally lapsed from September 3 to October 15; however, the lapse made little difference because violence had continued and even intensified during the pause).

November 2000 proved especially violent in Aceh, as military and police clashed with hundreds of thousands of Acehnese demonstrating at a two-day pro-referendum rally in the provincial capital. Outside the capital, as many as a million more were stranded on roadsides or in camps as soldiers blocked their efforts to attend the rally. Although the official death toll was in the 30s, several human rights groups said more than 200 Acehnese had been killed within a one-week period. Another 500 were reported missing.

As of December 2000, the situation in Aceh remained at a violent stalemate, with both sides saying the humanitarian pause would not be extended past January 2001. A referendum on independence appears unlikely, and most Acehnese say promises of greater autonomy are meaningless. While many Acehnese do not support all of GAM's tactics, and may even have reason to fear some elements of GAM, most appear to support the insurgency in general, given their common enemy—the Indonesian military. GAM has also engendered support by rebuilding homes burned by the military and providing some level of security. Often, however, civilians are targeted for their real or perceived support for GAM, or they simply become victims of the cross-fire. As the violence continues, Acehnese continue to flee their homes." Violence in Central Aceh sparks displacement (2001-2002)

- Mass violence in Central Aceh during 2001 involved civilian militias and opposed ethnic Acehnese/ethnic Gayo (where GAM had reportedly built support) to ethnic Javanese (backed by the military). Fighting started in early 2001 and escalated in June forcing thousands to flee. As of early 2002, there was still sporadic violence reported in Central Aceh.
- Increased military operations in Central Aceh have caused new displacement in June 2001, mainly in Central Aceh. Non-Acehnese (Javanese transmigrants) have fled to Takengon while the Acehnese have fled to East Aceh.
- According to Antara News Agency, approximately 7,000 persons have fled Central Aceh for Takengon (District capital) following security problems in June 2001. No indication was given as to the ethnic origin of the IDPs.

"Last year saw an outbreak of mass violence in the remote, mountainous district of Central Aceh which claimed as many as 400 lives in a few months. This outbreak is notable because it took place in a region where there had previously been relatively little violence. It was also unusual in that it involved civilian militias using home-made weapons and targeting whole communities. Central Aceh is inhabited by three groups: ethnic Acehnese, who form the majority in Aceh as a whole and live mainly on the coastal lowlands, ethnic Gayo from Central Aceh itself and ethnic Javanese, who have settled in the district since the early 1900s to work on its coffee plantations. Relations between these groups were said to be generally good, with frequent intermarriages.

By the end of 2000, two simultaneous developments had made Central Aceh much more volatile. GAM had built support among poor and marginalized Acehnese and Gayo, and had fanned anti-Javanese sentiment. Some local officials and politicians are also said to have aided GAM, either out of sympathy or fear. A militia or self-defence force had emerged to guard communities under threat from GAM, its members mostly Javanese. Sources sympathetic to independence link this militia to the ambitions of the local politicians seeking their own province. The date of the militia's emergence are unclear: rumours started to circulate in late 2000, though the local military commander implies that it was formed later.

In early 2001, sporadic GAM harassment of ethnic Javanese began to escalate. There were raids by GAM guerrillas and local sympathisers on Javanese communities in which people were killed, houses looted and burned. One source says GAM told its supporters, who included Acehnese and Gayo (and reportedly a few Javanese) that they could take the lands if the Javanese were forced out. The small military garrison in Central Aceh took little action other than ferrying people back to their villages after they had fled. It is possible that, outnumbered, they were afraid to intervene. In one case, local Javanese reportedly fought off an attack by GAM unaided, with deaths on both sides.

On 6 June, GAM attacked a small military post in northern Central Aceh, killing two soldiers and forcing the rest to flee. A week later came the belated military response: elite Kostrad and Kopassus soldiers were sent to Central Aceh to restore government control. Before this point, most of the violence seems to have been inflicted by GAM. Afterwards, the military and the Javanese militia meted out the same brutal treatment to ethnic Acehnese and some of the Gayo, including civilians. The military did not act as an impartial law enforcement force but as the avenger of the Javanese. As a result, many ethnic Acehnese have left the district and moved to the coast. The violence claimed nearly 400 lives, according to the local government, and destroyed more than a thousand houses. It is not clear from evidence available to ICG which side caused the most deaths, but both were involved in atrocities.

There is still sporadic violence in Central Aceh. At the end of January 2002, a married couple was reportedly murdered and seven others kidnapped by armed men, and in February several hundred people fled from different parts of the district, trekking to the coastal plain to seek refuge. Guerrillas are active in remote areas, and local people remain reluctant to go to the coffee plantations to work. (...) (ICG 30 January 2002)

Government balances military action with political and economic measures (2001-2002)

- Military offensives were launched in Aceh in April 2001 against GAM. "Special Autonomy" was conferred to the province in July 2001. Hundreds of people (mostly civilians) were killed during the height of the fighting in Central Aceh.
- Both sides are responsible for committing atrocities.
- Representatives of GAM and the Indonesian government met in Geneva on 2-3 February 2002 where they agreed to turn the armed conflict into a political dispute and involve other Acehnese groups than GAM in the discussions.
- The Indonesian government's policy in Aceh is one of balanced military action with political and economic devolution measures aiming at reducing people's grievances against the government. The main problem remains the unaccountability of the military and the police.

"Indonesia's efforts to end the separatist rebellion in Aceh entered a new phase in April 2001 with the launching of a military offensive against the guerrillas of the Free Aceh Movement (GAM). Three months later, the government passed a law conferring "special autonomy", or limited selfgovernment, on the province. This briefing paper charts recent events in Aceh, updating two ICG reports in 2001 which analysed these two strands of Indonesian policy: military force and the offer of autonomy.

The military offensive has done some damage to GAM but the guerrillas do not seem close to defeat. The majority of the war's victims are civilians and both sides are thought to have committed atrocities in the last year, including mass murder. One of the worst periods of violence was in the district of Central Aceh in mid-2001, during which hundreds of people were killed by GAM, the military or local militias.

The military has had some success in improving its battered public image in Aceh, though soldiers still seem largely unaccountable to the law, and reports continue of civilians being killed. This lack of accountability is also true of the police, who have an even worse reputation. As for GAM, parts of the movement have degenerated into banditry, costing it some support in Aceh. Although civilian views are hard to assess in the midst of the conflict, disillusionment and despair appear widespread.

Against this gloomy background, the meeting between representatives of the Indonesian government and GAM in Geneva on 2 and 3 February 2002 was a welcome development. They agreed to turn the armed conflict into a political dispute and involve other Acehnese groups than GAM in the discussions. However, previous agreements along these lines were violated by both sides, and there is a risk the current round of talks will meet the same fate. There is a need for concerted international pressure on both sides to continue talking and to uphold any future agreements that are reached, or the war is likely to drag on for some time at great human cost.

Indonesian policy aims to balance military action with political and economic measures to win back the loyalty of Acehnese who favour independence. In practice, military action is still the dominant factor. The implementation of special autonomy, intended to reduce Acehnese grievances against the government, is still in its early stages, and progress on fleshing out the law with local regulations has been slow. The implementation of autonomy is likely to take some time, and its final shape is far from clear. Given that GAM cannot force Indonesia to leave Aceh and the lack of international support for self-determination in the province, some form of autonomy still offers the only realistic chance of an eventual compromise peace. Such a plan is unlikely to work, however, without further reform of the Indonesian military and bureaucracy, which are still largely unaccountable for their actions to the Indonesian public and to the law." (ICG 30 January 2002, p. 1)

Agreement on cessation of hostilities fails, government launches major attack (May 2003)

- Offensive started Monday 19 May, many reported to be fleeing the violence.
- President signed a decree 18 May authorising a military operation and imposed martial law in Aceh
- Fighting has resumed with the government preparing for a military operation in case GAM refuse the May 12 deadline for accepting its terms for a meeting.
- Rebels appear to have used the reduction in violence that followed the signing of ceasefire agreement in December to significantly increase their fighting strength
- On 9 December 2002, an agreement on cessation of hostilities in Aceh was concluded in Geneva resulting in a dramatic drop in the level of violence.
- The agreement is a framework for negotiating a resolution of the conflict, and it remains extremely fragile
- On 9 February 2003, the two sides moved into a five-month implementation phase with major differences unresolved

"The Indonesian army has stepped up its military operations against the separatist rebels of the Free Aceh Movement (GAM). Since Monday 19 May, a large-scale military operation has been ongoing, following the breakdown of peace negotiations between the two sides.

A five-month-old peace deal was signed last December, in an effort to bring about an end to 26 years of conflict that has resulted in at least 12,000 deaths and the displacement of tens of thousands of people.

Reports emerging from Aceh over the last few days point to a bleak situation, with civilians being killed, schools being burnt, thousands of people fleeing their homes to escape from the violence and shortages of food supplies for those who have been displaced." (JRS 23 May 2003)

"Indonesian President Megawati Sukarnoputri signed a decree authorising a military operation and imposed martial law in Aceh province after peace talks in Tokyo with separatist rebels failed, security officials said early Monday.

Top security minister Susilo Bambang Yudhoyono said Megawati 'ordered concerned authorities to carry out the integrated operations,' including what was termed a security restoration operation.

The decree took effect at midnight (1700 GMT Sunday). Martial law will last for six months but may be extended. " (AFP 19 May 2003)

"Nine people have been killed in Indonesia's Aceh province since Monday as the government prepares for a military operation amid the virtual collapse of a peace pact with separatist rebels.

Five of the dead were members of the separatist Free Aceh Movement (GAM), according to reports Wednesday from police or the rebels.

On Tuesday the government announced it is preparing a security operation that will be part of an "integrated" approach, including humanitarian and law enforcement operations and an effort to restore local government administration.

Military chief General Endriartono Sutarto said the military operations will depend on the situation on May 12 -- the government-imposed deadline for GAM to accept its terms for a meeting aimed at saving the December 9 peace deal.

The government says GAM must abandon its push for independence and start disarming. The rebels refuse to accept any deadline." (AFP 7 May 2003)

"Hopes for peace in Indonesia's Aceh Province hang by a thread. Armed clashes between separatists and the Indonesian army have resumed. Soesilo Bambang Yudhoyono, Indonesia's Coordinating Minister for Politics and Security, recently gave the Free Aceh Movement a two-week ultimatum to accept Indonesian sovereignty or face the full force of the military. The Indonesian government and much of the public are exasperated with the Free Aceh Movement, known by its Indonesian initials as GAM. The rebels appear to have used the reduction in violence that followed the signing of ceasefire agreement in December to significantly increase their fighting strength. They are no closer to accepting autonomy, as an alternative to independence, than they were 27 years ago." (IHT 5 May 2003)

Hopes raised in December 2002 by an agreement on cessation of hostilities

"On 9 December 2002, an agreement on cessation of hostilities in Aceh was concluded in Geneva, bringing hope that an end to the 26-year-old conflict between Indonesian government forces and guerrillas of the pro-independence Free Aceh Movement (Gerakan Aceh Merdeka or GAM) was in sight. Since then there have been many positive developments, most strikingly, a dramatic drop in the level of violence.

The agreement, however, is not a peace settlement. It is rather a framework for negotiating a resolution of the conflict, and it remains extremely fragile. The first two months were supposed to be the confidence-building phase of the accord, but far from generating confidence, they may have actually reinforced each side's wariness of the other's long-term intentions.

On 9 February 2003, the two sides moved into a five-month implementation phase with major differences unresolved. These include how the Indonesian military will relocate as GAM places an increasing percentage of its weapons in designated locations. The leadership of GAM may have accepted the concept of autonomy as a starting point for discussions but not as a political end, and there remains little incentive for the guerrilla group to reinvent itself as a political party working within the Indonesian electoral system. The Indonesian army is not likely to sit quietly indefinitely if the reduction of violence leads, as appears to be the case, to more organising in support of independence, whether or not that organising constitutes a formal violation of the agreement. The provincial government of Nanggroe Aceh Darussalam (NAD) also constitutes an obstacle to lasting peace because it has such low credibility and is so widely seen as corrupt. As long as it is seen to embody "autonomy", as granted to Aceh under an August 2001 law, many Acehnese will continue to see independence as a desirable alternative.

The 9 December 2002 agreement, brokered by the Geneva-based non-governmental organisation, the Henri Dunant Centre (HDC), was the outcome of three years of tortuous negotiations and interim efforts to end the violence that worked briefly and then collapsed.

This agreement is different from all those that preceded it. It has international monitors in place. Its structure for investigation and reporting of violations is already far more transparent than those in the previous accords. It is backed at the highest levels of the Indonesian government and by a broad range of international donors. It is the best – and maybe the last – chance that the 4.4 million people of Aceh have for a negotiated peace. It may also be their best chance to get international backing for local government reform and substantial post-conflict reconstruction aid. If the agreement holds, not everyone wins, but if it fails, everyone loses." (ICG 27 February 2003, p. 3)

Military operation in Aceh results in forced displacement and human rights violations (May 2003-May 2004)

- Human Rights Watch has documented widespread human rights violations in Aceh province since the start of the military operations.

- Thousands of civilians have fled their homes and been forcibly relocated by the military for operational reasons.
- Displacement is often triggered by the proximity of armed conflict or direct acts of violence against civilians and has been used as a strategy of war by the parties to the conflict.
- Forced displacement is openly used by the military to separate GAM insurgents from the civilians.
- GAM forces have reportedly forcibly collected identification cards from villagers, thereby putting civilians at risk.
- New identity cards are being issued to all Aceh residents.

"The current military offensive in Aceh began on May 19, 2003, after a six-month ceasefire failed to resolve the longstanding conflict in the province. The Aceh offensive is Indonesia's largest military campaign since the country's invasion of East Timor in 1975. The operation involves an estimated 30,000 troops, who are opposed by approximately 5,000 armed members of the Free Aceh Movement (Gerakan Aceh Merdeka, GAM).

Human Rights Watch has documented widespread human rights violations in Aceh province since the start of the military operations in the province in May 2003. Based on testimony from Acehnese refugees in Malaysia there is substantial evidence documenting the role of Indonesian security forces in extra-judicial executions, forced disappearances, beatings, arbitrary arrests and detentions, and drastic limits on freedom of movement in Aceh. There is also a clear pattern of security forces singling out and persecuting young men, who the military claim to be members or supporters of GAM.

The renewed fighting has also caused massive internal displacement. Thousands of civilians have fled their homes and been forcibly relocated by the military for operational reasons. The military has used heavy artillery to attack rebel bases, causing more displacement of nearby villages as thousands flee their homes. The influx of troops has been accompanied by new and revived military tactics that are directly affecting civilians' daily lives. The stepped-up operations include patrols and "sweepings"—a set of tactics to identify separatists or their supporters through vehicle searches and document checks, moving systematically from one village to the next. In many incidents described to Human Rights Watch, security forces beat and abusively interrogated local residents. Other tactics under martial law include forcing villagers into compulsory night guard duty, and establishing a military presence at the village level, primarily through temporary posts manned by troops from outside Aceh. In all of these tactics young men are being singled out for harassment and abuse."(HRW April 2004, p. 4)

"Displacement is often triggered by the proximity of armed conflict or direct acts of violence against civilians. The number of civilian casualties is unconfirmed as the lack of access and independent monitoring mean that the numbers available are impossible to verify. Reports, however, indicate that while men are the primary targets for torture and execution, women are targeted for kidnapping, rape, and interrogation as a way to get information about their husbands or family members. Children become witnesses to violence.

The humanitarian community is also concerned that displacement has been used as a strategy of war by the parties to the conflict. Affected communities have had to leave their villages with no time to prepare and with little information about where they would be displaced to, for how long, and with no guarantee for the security of their property in their absence.

Movements to flee conflict have also been inhibited. Several layers of checkpoints have been established on the internal border between Aceh and North Sumatra where those seeking refuge in the neighbouring province are required to submit travel documents and their identity cards." (ICVA 5 September 2003)

Military engaged in the forced relocation of civilians

"In an effort to identify GAM members, the Indonesian military has reportedly engaged in operations to physically separate civilians from suspected armed separatists. Human Rights Watch has received credible accounts from Banda Aceh of the creation of camps for this purpose.

General Endriartono Sutarto, the commander of Indonesia's armed forces, has publicly stated that hundreds of thousands of Acehnese may be forced from their homes and interned in camps. He is reported as stating that local government officials were already preparing such facilities, but with an allegedly benign motive: "Our first priority is to separate GAM from the people, because we don't want any people to get hurt. If we have to move them to win this war, we will, but that's a last resort."

Up to 200,000 people may be moved from their homes and placed in special camps under military guard. Indonesia's Minister of Social Affairs is reported to have said: "We are waiting for an order from the military administration. Should they want to comb a certain area, we will move people from their homes."

On June 3, Colonel Ditya Sudarsono, spokesman for the martial law administrator, told reporters that, "It is quite possible for troops to have forced them [civilians] to leave their homes as part of security operations to distinguish them from GAM rebels. But once troops finished combing the area, the residents may return to their homes. Our objective is to protect civilians and to keep them from becoming victims of GAM." He went on to say that security forces would regard villagers who refuse to be moved as GAM because "that means they are protecting GAM and that makes them GAM members or its supporters."

Human Rights Watch is concerned about potential mistreatment of civilians who refuse to leave their homes and the use of population movements for military convenience--not, as General Endriartono suggests, as a last resort or solely for the protection of civilians. Human Rights Watch reminds the Government of Indonesia that mass relocation or displacement of civilians solely for the purpose of denying a willing social base to the opposing force is prohibited by international humanitarian law. The government of Indonesia should refrain from ordering the displacement of people unless there are genuine concerns for the security of the civilians involved, or there are imperative military reasons that demand such action be taken. Should such displacements be carried out, all possible measures should be taken to ensure that the sites to which they are relocated offer satisfactory conditions of shelter, hygiene, health, safety and nutrition.

Human Rights Watch has also received accounts from NGOs and press sources that GAM forces have been forcibly collecting identification cards from villagers. According to these sources, GAM has done this to protect its members and supporters from arrest by making it impossible for Indonesian forces to separate individuals on government lists of GAM members and supporters from other Acehnese. However, this tactic may put all young males--the most obvious source of potential GAM supporters--at risk of being accused of membership in GAM and suffering ill-treatment as a result.

Human Rights Watch has already received reports that soldiers have accused civilians without identification cards of being GAM supporters. The Indonesian authorities have responded by announcing that all Acehnese will be issued with new identification cards." (HRW 5 June 2003, pp. 3-4)

Prospects for negotiations (June 2004)

- 3 weeks after the lifting of the martial law in May 2004, the governor of Aceh has officially taken over command from the martial law administrator.
- Restrictions on foreigners entering the province will, however, continue to apply.
- Martial law in Aceh has been extended in November 2003 for another six months.

- The government is excluding any third-party mediation in the conflict with GAM and aims at crushing the rebel movement.
- Given the arrest of all GAM negotiators following the imposition of martial law in Aceh, chances are small that any new negotiators will come forward.

"Mr. Abdullah Puteh, the Governor of Aceh officially took over the command from the martial law administrator on 07 June 2004, almost three weeks after the government changed the province's status to a state of civil emergency. The transfer of command and operational control order were signed in a ceremony presided over by acting Coordinating Minister for Political and Security Affairs Mr. Hari Sabarno. A team of 18 assistants and observers would assist the civil emergency Administrator to help outline policies and solve problems that may occur during the civil emergency, and to monitor budget disbursement. The Governor reiterated that despite the province's change of status to civil emergency, a number of regulations from the martial law period still apply, including restriction on foreigners entering the province. This restriction will continue to hamper the humanitarian operations of international organizations (UN, Donors and International NGOs) in the province." (OCHA 30 June 2004)

"Indonesian President Megawati Sukarnoputri has decided to extend martial law in Aceh province where at least 1,300 people have been killed since May in a war with separatist rebels, it was announced Monday. Top security minister Susilo Bambang Yudhoyono said a full cabinet meeting would be held on Thursday to take a formal decision on the extension.

"The president has agreed that during the extension (period) the integrated operation should be improved and sharpened," Yudhoyono told reporters. He said the status would likely be extended for between four and six months." (AFP 3 November 2003)

"There is virtually no possibility that there will be a return to negotiations between the Indonesian government and GAM any time soon. The level of public and elite resentment against the "internationalisation" of the conflict through the use of outside mediators and against the legitimacy that negotiations gave to GAM remains high. Susilo Bambang Yudhoyono and a few retired army officers talk about the purpose of the operations being to force GAM back to the negotiating table. But their voices are largely drowned out by those who put the emphasis on crushing the insurgency. The TNI is determined to put a major dent in GAM's military capacity and political support structure. Unless or until their own under-reported casualties reach unacceptable levels, public support for the operations diminishes, or the political and economic costs become too high, there are not going to be serious moves toward talking with GAM.

If negotiations do eventually become possible, they are unlikely to take place under the auspices of the past facilitator of talks, the non-governmental, Geneva-based Centre for Humanitarian Dialogue, known in Aceh by its former name, the Henri Dunant Centre or HDC. The role of mediator will almost certainly have to be played by a government, not an NGO. Japan may be the leading candidate, with the U.S. in a supporting role, although there are reportedly differences within the Japanese Foreign Ministry about how active it should be.

It is difficult, however, to see how the Megawati government will return to the table with the GAM leaders in Sweden, whom it has been trying to brand as terrorists. If space for a dialogue emerges after the conflict lessens, the government may insist on involving Muzakkir Manaf, the GAM military commander. Given the arrests of GAM's entire Aceh-based delegation within hours after the emergency was declared, the rebels' acceptance of such an arrangement seems unlikely unless the security of the negotiators can be guaranteed. The Indonesian government is also likely to insist on absolute acceptance of Indonesian sovereignty over Aceh as the prerequisite for dialogue. That, as well, will make resumption of negotiations more difficult.

But even if the prospects for renewed dialogue seem grim at the moment, governments and donors most concerned about Aceh are quietly trying to put in place the foundations for talks so that when the political atmosphere improves, the opportunity can be seized. And despite the strong nationalistic reaction among politicians and parliamentarians to expressions of international disapproval and concern over the conduct of operations in Aceh, most Acehnese believe such expressions are crucial. They provide, for the moment, the critical ballast to the one-sided flow of information from the military, and even if resented, they at least are being heard." (ICG 23 July 2003, p. 7)

Central Sulawesi (Palu & Poso)

1,000 people killed and 100,000 displaced in inter-religious violence in Central Sulawesi (1998-2001)

- Fighting broke out in December 1998 after a Christian stabbed a Muslim in Poso.
- Underlying economic, ethnic, and religious tensions were soon compounded by the actions of political rivals, some of whom encouraged and exploited the violence.
- In the following 4 years 1,000 people were killed, with many more injured and one hundred thousand displaced.
- Although the violence reflects social tensions, the fact that it has persisted for so long with such a high human toll is a product of systemic government failure, both local and national.
- Failure of the government to protect citizens also gave credibility to hard-liners on both sides and facilitated the arrival of the radical Muslim group Laskar Jihad, based hundreds of miles away on Java.
- 5 phases: outbreak (December 1998), intensification of Muslim attacks (April 16, 2000 to May 3, 2000), counterattacks by Christian communities (May 23, 2000 to July 2000), displacement and destruction (June to December 2001), and the Malino peace process and its sometimes violent aftermath (January 2002 to the present)

"On December 24, 1998, a young Protestant in the town of Poso in Central Sulawesi province, Indonesia, stabbed a Muslim in the arm. Fighting broke out around town, and a spiral of violence was unleashed. The Poso region proved fertile ground for communal violence: underlying economic, ethnic, and religious tensions were soon compounded by the actions of political rivals, some of whom encouraged and exploited the violence.

Over the next four years, Muslim and Christian groups mounted extended attacks on opposing neighborhoods and villages. For most of that time there was no effective response from authorities. Although it is difficult to determine the precise scope of the violence, it has been extensive: the most credible sources estimate that 1,000 people have been killed, with many more injured and one hundred thousand displaced.

This report provides a comprehensive account of the violence, culled from eyewitness interviews and data compiled by local organizations. It analyzes the Indonesian government's response and the reasons violence has continued to erupt periodically in Poso for four years running. Although the violence reflects social tensions, the fact that it has persisted for so long with such a high human toll is a product of systemic government failure, both local and national. According to many residents, an effective and unbiased deployment of police or military (Tentara Nasional Indonesia, TNI), supported by a justice system that could hold perpetrators individually accountable, could have ended the problem when it began in 1998.

Residents of Poso allege that, in many cases, cycles of recrimination and revenge have been fueled by local or outside provocateurs, and conspiracy theories are rife. Although provocation has played a role in other incidents of unrest in Indonesia and there are signs of such efforts in Poso, this report does not attempt to address all such claims, many of which are based more on speculation than evidence. As noted below, it is clear that, whatever the merits of such claims, authorities have had the capacity to take decisive action to stop the violence and have failed to do so.

In several different cases, highlighted below, eyewitness observers report that when security forces were deployed and acted professionally, outbreaks of violence were sometimes halted in a matter of hours. Other attacks were allowed to proceed over the course of several days. In some cases, when the police or military did act, they exacerbated conditions by firing on protestors or committing human rights violations as a form of retaliation, a frequent phenomenon in conflict areas in Indonesia. Only a handful of people were prosecuted for violent crimes, with sentencing often inconsistent. Many of the worst crimes have gone unpunished, and several subsequent outbreaks were explicitly linked to frustration over the lack of arrests for prior violence.

Conflicts eventually broke out in more than half of Poso's subdistricts. As the conflict escalated, the number and sophistication of weapons increased and the death toll grew higher, creating new ranks of aggrieved victims seeking revenge in the absence of justice. The failure of the government to protect citizens also gave credibility to hard-liners on both sides and facilitated the arrival of the radical Muslim group Laskar Jihad, based hundreds of miles away on Java.

There has been a great deal made of the role of Laskar Jihad in exacerbating conflicts in Maluku and elsewhere, and our research confirms that Laskar Jihad's presence helped fuel conflict in Poso. As Muslim leaders told us, however, Laskar Jihad had this effect in part because local Muslim communities had lost all faith in the security forces and saw Laskar Jihad's presence as instrumental to their security. As this report was being finalized, Laskar Jihad announced it was disbanding and that members in Poso would soon leave the region.

Central Sulawesi has also gained attention recently as the site of a possible al-Qaeda training center. Although this report summarizes the information that others have gathered, Human Rights Watch did not research the question and came across no firsthand evidence on the subject during the course of our research in Poso. The role of underground international Islamist networks in Indonesia clearly merits attention, as the October 12 bombing in Bali that killed some 180 people tragically demonstrates. It is important, however, that such analysis does not obscure the factors responsible for conflicts such as Poso. As in Maluku, the conflict in Poso reflects local and domestic Indonesian political dynamics that would exist with or without outside agitators, let alone an international terrorist training center. Indeed, the causal arrow may point in the opposite direction: the chaos that destroyed so many lives in Poso is the very environment that groups such as al-Qaeda seek out as bases for their operations.

This report begins with an overview of the religious, political, and economic roots of the conflict. Religion became the predominant idiom of the conflict, yet participants recognized and were eager to emphasize to Human Rights Watch that many other factors have been at play. Significantly, Poso has long had a religious mix, with indigenous and migrant Muslim populations, as well as locally rooted Protestant and Catholic communities. Relations among these different communities were relatively peaceful in the years prior to 1998. As in Maluku, however, the nearly even split of Poso's population between Muslims and Christians meant that violent cleavages, once they emerged, could be expected to persist absent decisive intervention by security authorities.

As in other areas in Indonesia, the power vacuum created by the resignation of Soeharto in May 1998 opened the doors to new, often unruly social forces. More than three decades of militarism and authoritarian rule had left civilian institutions discredited and in disarray, and had made military and police institutions fundamentally suspect in the minds of many local inhabitants. Local political battles also fueled the conflict. In a number of cases, noted below, outbreaks of violence were directly connected to competition for local political office and the accompanying economic spoils. The Poso conflict was also exacerbated when it became a national issue, and partisans, in particular members of Laskar Jihad, came to Poso for reasons having more to do with national than local political dynamics.

After providing an overview of the context, the report offers a chronological account of the violence. Largely following the framework used by local residents when describing the Poso conflict, this report divides the conflict into five phases: outbreak (December 1998), intensification of Muslim attacks (April 16, 2000 to May 3, 2000), counterattacks by Christian communities (May 23, 2000 to July 2000), displacement and destruction (June to December 2001), and the Malino peace process and its sometimes violent aftermath (January 2002 to the present). As the first three phases have been covered elsewhere,² this report focuses on the last two.

In the first two phases, urban Muslim migrants and their rural allies in villages along the coast dominated. There were fewer fatalities than in later phases, but many neighborhoods were badly damaged. While the third phase saw casualties on both sides, it was largely a vendetta by Protestants and a few Catholic migrants, and Muslim casualties were particularly high.

Many local sources describe the fourth phase as having begun in June 2001 with a new wave of house burnings, a massacre of Muslim women and children, and numerous clashes. The arrival of Laskar Jihad in July 2001 and the widespread destruction of villages that followed eventually prompted intervention by Jakarta." (HRW 4 December 2002, pp. 3-4)

Security improved after signing of Malino Declaration and return is ongoing, but process remains fragile (July 2003)

- Insecurity is still preventing significant return with periodic criminal actions and violence. Few Christians are willing to return to Moslem-dominated areas and few Moslems are ready to return to Christian-dominated areas.
- Improved security situation have enabled returns, but situation remains fragile.
- Signing of Malino Peace agreement and deployment of 8,500 soldiers has helped calm down the situation in Poso.
- Many IDPs fear that the stability is only temporary and want to stay where they are.
- Under the auspices of the Government, 50 representatives of both sides signed the Malino peace Declaration in December 2001.
- Some IDPs have taken advantage of the better security situation to go back to their area of origin

Indonesia backgrounder: Jihad in Central Sulawesi, ICG, 3 February 2004

"The continuing precipitating factor preventing significant returns is security. The uneasy peace settlement signed in South Sulawesi (Malino I) is punctuated with periodic criminal actions on both sides elongating tensions. It is still uncertain as to whether the present relative present calm is enduring because the community wants security, or due to the heavy presence of security forces. There are still automatic military weapons in the possession of some community members, and attacks by masked provocateurs are still common. The communities want the military to stay, while trying to activate their own security arrangements.

The Government has instituted a process of district fragmentation to alleviate the inter-communal rivalries over district leaders that many believe initially fed the violence. But, it is believed that this will not be a solution and may only intensify the divisions. Still, today, due to trauma, very few Christians are prepared to return to Moslem-dominated areas, and very few Moslems are prepared to return to Christian-dominated communities." (OCHA & Bakornas July 2003, p. 18)

"This agreement [Malino Declaration] indeed brought relative peace and generated hopes for a brighter future in Central Sulawesi. The peace process was strengthened by the deployment of large numbers of security forces to the area. The Malino Declaration coincided with the GoRI policy on handling IDPs which introduced three options to end IDP crisis: return, local empowerment, and transmigration. In Central Sulawesi the return option has proved to be more successful with continued support from the government at all levels. Thus far, out of 31,326 families (143,354 persons), a total of 25,790 families (107,283 persons) have returned to their places of origin, and have begun to resume their lives.

The mission found that the trend is positive and that the return process continues, although at a slower pace than expected. This is due to the fragility of the situation, mistrust that exist within communities, the fact that many IDPs have been displaced three or four times over the last two to three years, and lack of resources and basic social services." (Bakornas & OCHA March 2003, 2)

"Since the signing of the peace agreement in Malino, South Sulawesi, on 21 December 2001, Christians and Muslims have ceased hostilities. The situation in Poso town has cooled down, especially since the government deployed 8'500 soldiers belonging to the Special Armed Forces and Navy in the area.

However, many of the displaced are very hesitant and mistrustful of the security situation in Poso, especially when the soldiers leave the area in June. These people are highly traumatised after suffering three major attacks during the period 1998-2001. Furthermore, they have not much confidence that the government will handle the situation in an even-handed manner. Many of the displaced have decided to settle permanently in the places which have afforded them shelter over the last 3 years. However, many of the more vulnerable families still lack any means of restarting their lives and others need further assistance to enable them to again become self sufficient." (ACT 31 May 2002)

"In December 2001, the Malino Declaration was signed by some 50 representatives of the two conflicting sides. The process was arranged by the central government and led by Minister of Peoples' Affairs, Jusuf Kala. The Declaration has been a significant milestone in curtailing the violence, although the situation has been physically controlled through deployment of additional security forces by the central government. [...]

The security situation has improved significantly since the signing of the Malino Declaration (MD). IDPs have started returning to their places of origin, mainly to clean their houses, look after the remaining property and collect their harvest. While some have stayed in the villages, many others have chosen to go back to areas of displacements. However, many people expressed concerns about the durability of security situation and were linking it to the presence of military and Brimob forces. Security was mentioned to remain a top priority for any return movement, in particular for Christian communities. At least one security post to be established at each village."(OCHA 1 February 2002, p. 1)

"The Malino Peace Declaration has been able to stop the conflict, yet not to resolve the conflict. The attitude of the Christian community in Poso toward the Malino agreement was that there was not much else that they could do. They don't have a great deal of confidence in the government's intentions with respect to resolving the conflict, yet they will obey the Malino agreement as far as they possibly are able to.

International pressure was able to stop the fierce attacks by Laskar Jihad last November as they attempted to fulfill their intention to celebrate the Muslim Eid festival in Tentena, the most concentrated pocket of Christians at this moment. In fact, how a deep conflict could be resolved in two days in Malino has been a very intriguing question in a lot of people's minds. Realizing this international pressure, therefore, the Laskar Jihad insisted that in the Malino agreement, for reconciliation to take place there had to be no foreign intervention. Yet at the same time, in several proven cases there has been shown to be little if any intention by Laskar Jihad to end the conflict. Several provocations have been identified and reported, and the most blatant one was the bombing of four churches on December 31 and January 1 in Palu, where Mr. Jono, a Muslim participant in the Malino process, was directly involved in the bombing. Even though Mr. Jono was arrested, the judicial process has yet to be followed. Since then, there have been more violations and provocations committed by Laskar Jihad toward both the Christian and Muslim communities." (Jubilee Campaign January 2002, p. 10)

Communal violence in West and Central Kalimantan

Ethnic violence and displacement in West Kalimantan (1996-2004)

- In late 1996 and early 1997, violence between Dayaks and Madurese led to the displacement of 15,000 people (most of them Madurese).
- At the end of 1997, 20,000 Madurese were thought to remain displaced and too afraid to go back.
- In March 1999, violence between the Dayaks and the Madurese erupted once again in Sambas district. As a result, at least 200 Madurese were killed and more than 35,000 Madurese were displaced to the provincial capital Pontianak, while others fled to Java.
- In 2001, Madurese IDPs were evacuated from the city of Pontianak following threats by local Dayak and Malay people.
- In 2004, most IDPs have been resettled in relocation sites

1996-1997: ethnic violence displaces between 15,000 and 20,000 Madurese

"In late 1996 and early 1997, communal violence erupted in the province of West Kalimantan (on the island of Borneo, which Indonesia shares with Malaysia). The violence was between indigenous Dayak people and migrants from the island of Madura, off the coast of East Java. Under Indonesia's "transmigration" policy, the government helps residents from the overcrowded island of Java to migrate to outlying islands, usually by giving them land there. Acehnese view this policy as Jakarta's attempt to spread the influence of Javanese culture. In West Kalimantan, Dayaks and other tribes blame the transmigration for the loss of jobs and tribal land.

As a result of the violence, more than 15,000 people, almost all of them Madurese, were displaced. According to UNHCR, it was not known how many Madurese or others in West Kalimantan remained displaced at the end of 1998 as a result of the previous year's violence. UNHCR noted, however, that "the province still indeed harbors a potent threat of unrest due to a simmering feud" between the Madurese and the Dayaks." (USCR June 1999)

"As of April 1997, the press reported that 3,054 homes had been destroyed, and more than 15,000 people, almost all of them Madurese, had been displaced. Those figures were probably low, as it was difficult to make an accurate count. Some Madurese returned to Madura, others moved in with relatives in other parts of West Kalimantan, some were housed in temporary barracks at army posts and in other holding centers. The districts of Sambas and Sanggau were the worst affected, with respectively 5,000 and 3,122 known displaced, although again, the figures are almost certainly too low. An Australian paper quoted Transmigration Minister Siswono Yoduhusodo as saying that at least 20,000 Madurese remained in refugee camps and were "too traumatized by the violence" to go back to their homes.

West Kalimantan Governor Aspar Aswin said that the provincial government would try to resettle them elsewhere in the province, and that 950 houses were under construction, as well as 450 homes inside existing transmigration centers. He also noted that there was a problem with the agricultural land the displaced people had owned. If they could not or did not wish to return, the government would sell it and turn over the proceeds to the former owners, he said. But with reports of Dayaks already moving on to Madurese land, the problem was not going to be as easily resolved as the governor suggested. Moreover, Indonesian officials at all levels also have a poor record in handling land disputes, and few landowners would like to see the government act as their sales agent." (HRW December 1997, Chapter IV)

1999: violence displaces 35,000 Madurese

"In March [1999], communal violence erupted once again in the province of West Kalimantan, on the island of Borneo, which Indonesia shares with Malaysia. Indigenous Dayaks and local Malays carrying machetes, spears, and guns attacked Madurese transmigrants (whom they blamed for the loss of jobs and tribal land) in the coastal district of Sambas. The attackers burned homes, decapitated people, and revived the tradition of eating the organs of the vanquished. The Indonesian military sent hundreds of troops to restore order.

The ethnic Madurese, who are predominantly Christian, come from the island of Madura, off the western coast of Borneo. Indonesia's former president, Suharto, began moving many Madurese to West Kalimantan in the 1960s to alleviate overpopulation on Madura. Since then, eight conflicts have broken out between Madurese and Dayaks, and one between Madurese and ethnic Chinese.

As a result of the renewed violence, at least 200 Madurese were killed and some 35,000 others (35 percent of the Madurese population in West Kalimantan) fled to the provincial capital, Pontianak, and other nearby towns. Others fled to Java.

Indonesian security forces escorted some of the fleeing Madurese in convoys, although ethnic Malays and Dayaks set up road blocks to stop them. In Pontianak, the displaced were housed in a converted sports center and other facilities. Others sought shelter with family or friends. Although local and national agencies provided some assistance, the facilities were reportedly poor and health problems were rampant. By June, almost 80 children under age five had died in the centers. " (USCR June 2000)

2001: Madurese IDPs forced to evacuate camps in Pontianak

"Local government began evacuating Madurese Internally Displaced People (IDPs) from the city of Pontianak, West Kalimantan, on Saturday, following a threat by local Dayak and Malay people of further bloodshed if they refuse to leave by July 1. Around 137 families were evacuated. They will be relocated to areas outside Pontianak city, namely Sei Asam and Tebang Kacang.

The Governor of West Kalimantan Aspar Aswin confirmed the evacuations, though the exact number of Madurese IDPs to be relocated is not known. Many IDPs are still being persuaded to join the relocation program.

Hundreds of IDPs families who took shelter in one Pontianak local sports stadium became the target of attacks by local people last Sunday (24/6), after the alleged murder of one local boy by four IDPs near the IDPs' compound.

Almost 100,000 Madurese settlers fled Sambas, a three-hour drive from Pontianak, after violent ethnic clashes broke out two years ago. Madurese IDPs have been accommodated in several small and large public buildings serving as shelters in Pontianak city." (World Vision 4 July 2001)

2004: Most Madurese IDPs have been relocated

"A conflict between ethnic Malay and Dayak groups on the one side, and ethnic Madurese migrants on the other, erupted in 1999 in Sambas and Singkawang, West Kalimantan, causing 78,000 Madurese to flee from their homes to the provincial capital Pontianak where they were accommodated in public facilities until June 2002. After the murder of several Madurese who had returned to Sambas to dispose of their property, the possibility of a general return of the IDPs was ruled out. Therefore the GoRI, through the Department of Manpower and Transmigration and the Department of Resettlement and Regional Infrastructure, provided relocation housing for most IDPs in 12 relocation sites. In addition to housing, the GoRI also provided 11,000 families of agricultural background with two hectares of agricultural land per family. Since their move to relocation sites, IDPs are being referred to as "Settlers". A total of 1,259 households have chosen the alternative option of a government local settlement ("empowerment") package of IDR 5 million (US$ 600) per family to arrange their own accommodation and living." (OCHA 9 April 2004, p. 21)

Ethnic violence and displacement in Central Kalimantan (2004)

- In February 2001 inter-ethnic violence started in Sampit, Central Kalimantan and rapidly spread to other regions, namely Palangkaraya.
- As of 2002, some 100,000 Madurese were living in difficult conditions on Madura Island where they have sought refuge since 2001.
- Of the total of 180,000 people displaced, a majority remain in displacement in East Java (mainly on Madura Island) as of 2004

"The violence in Sampit, Central Kalimantan, started on the night of February 17-18 when a Dayak house was burned down. Rumor spread that an ethnic Madurese was responsible, and immediately, a band of Dayaks went into a Madurese neighborhood and began burning houses. In the ensuing violence, a Dayak and a Madurese were killed. This sent the clash to a new level, and in a matter of days, the violence had spread to Kualakayan, a subdistrict 110 km north of Sampit, and to Palangkaraya, the provincial capital of Central Kalimantan, some 220 km away.

The violence is reported to have been linked to an effort to restructure the office of bupati, or district chief, in the district of Kotawaringin Timur, central Kalimantan. Two local officials, who apparently believed they were going to lose their jobs in the restructuring, reportedly paid Rp.20 million to two "coordinators" to start the violence in Sampit, the largest timber port in Indonesia. One official was the head of local forestry unit (Kepala Resort Pemangku Hutan or KRPH) for the Tumbang Manjul area; the other was a staff member of the local Bappeda or regional planning office in the district, according to local police quoted in the Banjarmasin Post, a local newspaper. ("Dua Pejabat Kotim Diburu," February 20, 2001.)

In the restructuring, according to the bupati, Wahyudi K. Anwar, several departments would be joined together and only one person could be head. But he said no one would lose his job; rather, those who could not be retained as heads of department would still rise to the next rank in the civil service.

This is not the first time that a struggle over local posts at the district level has led to major violence. One factor in the outbreak of communal violence in Poso, Sulawesi, in May 2000 that left close to 300 dead was the competition between two men of different faiths to be bupati.

But there was a more immediate source of tension in the Sampit area. In the same district that was facing restructuring of the local administration, Kotawaringin Timur, there was an outbreak of violence between ethnic Dayak and Madurese in mid-December 2000. It centered on the village of Kareng Pangli, subdistrict Katingan Hilir, some 200 kilometers from Sampit. In that instance, the violence arose after a dispute about a gambling locale. One local source told Human Rights Watch on Monday that it started as "purely criminal," but after two Dayaks were killed, it erupted into a full-scale attack on the Madurese community. In August 2000, a similar clash had taken place in the neighboring district of Kotawaringin Barat, leaving several dead.

In the Sampit outbreak, the death toll from February 18 through February 26 was well over 200, and estimates are ranging as high as 600. (The local government said on Monday the main hospital in Sampit had recorded 210 deaths, but many of the people killed were never brought to the hospital.) The number of Madurese displaced from their homes was estimated at 24,000. By Tuesday, there were reports of at least three Madurese killed in Palangkaraya, many Madurese houses had been burned down, and thousands of Madurese were using every available form of transportation to leave because of rumors of a Dayak attack. The government sent ships to rescue many of the displaced in Sampit, and both they and Madurese from elsewhere were streaming into the East Javanese city of Surabaya.

As of Sunday night, five battalions of Indonesian army troops had been sent to the area, as the police seemed totally unable to control the violence. According to local press reports today, the bodies of 118 Madurese were found in the subdistrict of Parenggean, apparently killed by Dayaks as they tried to get to the city center in order to be evacuated by security forces." (HRW 28 February 2001)

At least 100,000 Madurese have fled to Madura Island (2002)

"Indonesia's Madura Island, with limited resources for education, employment, and farming for its own population, is facing the consequences of an influx of over 100,000 displaced people. Madurese from Sampit, Central Kalimantan, fled to Madura Island as a result of conflict between Dayaks and Madurese in February 2001. To date, little international attention or assistance has been invested in Madura Island's bleak IDP situation. Humanitarian assistance focusing on development initiatives promoting self-sufficiency is essential to the survival of the displaced Madurese.

The Madurese who lived in Central Kalimantan either migrated there or were moved there as part of Indonesia's transmigration program. They have ethnic links with Madura Island, which is located off the coast of East Java. Host families on Madura Island readily accepted Madurese fleeing the February 2001 violence into their homes, and the remainder, nearly 30,000, are residing in IDP camps. IDPs have received limited information about their prospects for return or prospects for integration into Madurese communities. In addition, IDPs have little or no opportunities for employment or education, and suffer from severe trauma, according to NGO reports. Most IDPs would like to return to their homes in Sampit, though return has been made impossible by continued mistrust between the Dayaks and the Madurese, with fear of continued violence." (RI 15 April 2002)

Situation as of 2004

"A majority of the 180,000 people, displaced from Central Kalimantan to East Java province during the conflict between Dayaks (indigenous population) and Madurese (migrants) in early 2001, remain in displacement on mainland East Java and Madura Island (Sampang and Bangkalan districts). The IDPs are spread over 140 villages and mainly reside with host families and in camps (a smaller number) provided by the government and private institutions. Most IDPs have expressed the wish to return to their villages of origin once the security situation allows for their return. During 2002 and early 2003, some 43,400 IDPs have managed to return with nominal or no assistance from the government to selected places where the communities were ready to receive them and/or have found other solutions.

The provincial government has committed itself to finding alternative solutions in 2004 for the remaining 130,000 IDPs. The government has also issued regulations aimed at assisting the return of IDPs to the most severely affected districts through allocating financial resources, enhancing inter-provincial coordination, and promoting inter-community dialogue." Violence and displacement following independence vote in East Timor

Violence and threats cause displacement prior to the popular consultation (February-August 1999)

- Flight, especially hiding in the hills, has been a long-standing coping mechanism of the East Timorese given the political tensions and serious violations of human rights.
- Mass displacement did not begin only after the results of the popular consultation were announced but also occurred in the months leading up to the ballot.
- As of February 1999, 60,000 fled mostly from isolated villages to district towns and, often, onwards to the capital Dili, following a campaign of intimidation and violence launched by pro-integrationist militia against persons and communities considered to support independence.
- Since many displaced people had lost their ID documents UNAMET introduced a system whereby IDPs could register to vote.
- 98 per cent of the registered electorate voted and 78 per cent of the voters rejected the government's autonomy offer.
- A number of people reportedly voted and then immediately fled into the hills.

"11. In East Timor, displacement is not a recent phenomenon. Flight, especially hiding in the hills, has been a long-standing coping mechanism of the East Timorese given the political tensions and serious violations of human rights that have characterized the Territory's history since its annexation by Indonesia in 1975. During that period, the Representative was informed, a large number of people also were forced by the Indonesian authorities to move from their traditional homes in the mountains into urban areas. This report, however, focuses on the heightened displacement crisis associated with the popular consultation on the Indonesian Government's offer of autonomy for East Timor within Indonesia, held on 30 August 1999. Mass displacement, it is important to underline, did not begin only after the results of the popular consultation were announced but also occurred in the months leading up to the ballot.

A. Prior to the popular consultation

12. As early as February 1999, following the Government's proposal in January for either greater autonomy or independence for East Timor, a campaign of intimidation and violence launched by pro-integrationist militia against persons and communities considered to support independence began to generate significant internal displacement. An estimated 60,000 persons became internally displaced, fleeing mostly from isolated villages to district towns and, often, onwards to the capital Dili. Initially, those fleeing tended to be taken into the homes of relatives and friends. As their numbers increased, churches became principal centres of refuge.

15. Regarding the apparent aim of the intimidation, the Representative received reports of internally displaced persons being forcibly grouped together by militia for the purpose of indoctrinating them to vote pro-autonomy, with this occurring five to six weeks before campaigning was officially allowed to begin. And yet, the very fact of being displaced presented obstacles to the exercise of the right to participate in the popular consultation. The process of voter registration required the presentation of two forms of personal identification – documents that for many of the internally displaced had been destroyed or lost in the course of displacement. In an important initiative to overcome this problem, the United Nations Mission in East Timor (UNAMET), which was charged with overseeing the popular consultation, introduced a system whereby an affidavit from the village chief, priest, or other community leader from either the area of origin or the area to which the person concerned had been displaced was sufficient to enable internally displaced persons to register to vote.

16. Notwithstanding the intimidation and violence characterizing the period leading up to the vote, the high voter turn-out - 98 per cent of the registered electorate - indicates that they did not keep people from voting, or from voting to reject the Government's offer of autonomy, as did 78 per cent of the voters. Indeed, the Representative was informed that one of the highest voter turn-outs was by a community of internally displaced persons, all of whom (save two persons, of whom one was giving birth) courageously participated in the vote despite the severe intimidation and risks to their personal security. In another indication of the importance that the population attached to their participation in the popular consultation, it was reported that a number of people reportedly voted and then immediately fled into the hills." (CHR 6 April 2000, pp. 4-5)

Violence and displacement following the announcement of the results of the popular consultation (September 1999)

- Displacement occurred after the announcement of the results of the ballot was characterized by systematic and widespread violations of human rights, violence and mass destruction unleashed by prointegration militias with the collusion of elements of the Indonesian security forces
- 80 per cent of the population was displaced by violence following the announcement of the results.
- 500,000 fled within East Timor, mainly in the hills while 240,000 fled or were forcibly relocated in West Timor and elsewhere in Indonesia.
- The mass removal of some 250,000 persons from East Timor to West Timor was reportedly prepared in advance by the military, in cooperation with the police.
- It aimed at discrediting the process of popular consultation by signalling that a sizeable portion of the population disagreed with the results and thereby calling into question the legitimacy of the outcome.

B. Following the announcement of the results of the ballot

17. In the days and weeks following the announcement on 4 September of the results of the ballot, the displacement crisis escalated dramatically, affecting an estimated 80 per cent of the population of East Timor. Displacement occurred in two major patterns: some 500,000 persons fled within East Timor, mostly going into hiding in the hills and usually only a few kilometers from their homes, while an estimated 240,000 fled or, as is reported to have been most often the case, were forcibly relocated, principally to West Timor but also to other parts of Indonesia. Displacement also occurred to other countries: some 1,500 persons were assisted by the international community in being evacuated to Australia.

19. As has been well documented in other reports, the general context in which displacement occurred after the announcement of the results of the ballot was characterized by systematic and widespread violations of human rights, violence and mass destruction unleashed by prointegration militias with the collusion of elements of the Indonesian security forces. Many people spontaneously took flight both within and outside of East Timor, in an effort to escape these conditions of severe physical insecurity. However, displacement was also systematic, such that large numbers of persons did not flee but were forcibly relocated, that is, deliberately moved against their will. In several cases, people reportedly were ordered from their homes and, often at gunpoint, herded onto trucks, ships and planes, destined principally for West Timor but also for other parts of Indonesia. From the point of view of logistics alone, the operation appears to have been highly organized, with advance planning having been required. Indeed, the Representative was informed of documentary evidence indicating preparations on the part of the military, in cooperation with the police, in advance of the announcement of the results of the popular consultation, for the mass removal of some 250,000 persons from East Timor to West Timor. The displacement and evacuation of people, along with the intimidation, terror and destruction of property that occurred, the Commission of Inquiry has concluded, "would not have been possible without the active involvement of the Indonesian army, and the knowledge and approval of the top military command" (A/54/726-S/2000/59, para. 138).

22. To a certain extent, the wave of violence and destruction unleashed after the announcement of the outcome of the popular consultation was a reaction of rage and revenge on the part of pro-integrationist forces to the results of the ballot, which clearly were not in their favour. These feelings were undoubtedly magnified by what, it was suggested, must have been a sense of shock and disbelief at the overwhelming size of the pro-independence majority. Acts of spite appeared to be intended to ensure that independence for East Timor would come at a heavy price, including in terms of denying East Timor the benefits of the infrastructure and other material investment that had been made over the years, thereby undermining its successful development as an independent nation. It was also a widely held view that the actions of the pro-integrationist forces in East Timor were intended to serve as a foreboding message to secessionist movements elsewhere in the Indonesian archipelago. While East Timor may be considered an exceptional case given its history, it is believed that the Indonesian military nonetheless were, through their actions there, giving a warning signal to insurgent movements in a number of places in Indonesia, most notably in Aceh.

23. Regarding both flight and the measures of forced relocation to West Timor and elsewhere in Indonesia, a number of overriding political factors appear to have been at play. The sudden mass movement of large numbers of people from East Timor, including both pro-integrationists who fled for fear of their own security and persons supporting independence who were forcibly relocated, appears to have been aimed at discrediting the process of popular consultation by signalling that a sizeable portion of the population disagreed with the results and thereby calling into question the legitimacy of the outcome. If the hope was that the ballot accordingly would be redone, it was suggested that it was likely believed that the electorate would by that point have been so terrorized as to ensure a radically different result. It was also suggested that the mass displacement would assist in fostering the impression that East Timor was on the verge of civil war and descent into chaos against which Indonesia could act as a stabilizing influence. The most widely held view was that the mass forced relocation was undertaken in order to ensure for pro-integrationist forces a constituency or power base in West Timor and even a potential "bargaining chip" in future negotiations. This last reason would appear to best explain why, as will be explored below, displaced persons in West Timor continue to be impeded from returning even months after the Government of Indonesia accepted the results of the ballot." (CHR 6 April 2000, pp. 4-7)

28,000 former refugees still displaced in West Timor (April 2004)

- In May 2003, a Presidential Decree provided the former refugees with two options: register as Indonesians citizens or accept temporary resident status
- As of early 2003, most of the estimated 280,000 refugees have managed to make their way home to East Timor. But 30,000 others remain behind.
- Government no longer tolerates refugees living in camps and they have been told to move – either to return immediately to East Timor or resettle elsewhere in Indonesia.
- Rumour mill and the absence of unbiased and appropriate information in West Timor continue to pose obstacles for those who wish to return.
- With violence no longer a threat, a cessation clause on refugee status has been invoked by UNHCR, UN refugees agency.

"A Presidential Decree adopted in May 2003 and subsequent instructions from the Department of Home Affairs provided the former refugees in West Timor with an opportunity to register either as Indonesian citizens or accept temporary resident status (in anticipation of future return). The registration is combined with the issuance of relevant documentation, including Identity Cards." (UNOCHA 9 April 2004, p. 17)

"Amidst the violence that followed the UN-sponsored referendum on East Timor's (now Timor-Leste) independence in September 1999, some 280,000 East Timorese crossed the border into the Indonesian side of Timor island. Some fled to escape violence, but many were coerced to leave their homes and cross the border by armed militia. Living under the noses of militia in rudimentary refugee camps in West Timor has meant limited access to reliable information on the situation back at home. So the process of refugee return has been a slow and painful one. As of early 2003, most refugees have managed to make their way home to East Timor. But 30,000 others remain behind.

Living alongside an equally poor local population in West Timor, in January 2003 these East Timorese are now, once again, stuck between a rock and a hard place. The government of Indonesia will no longer tolerate refugees living in camps and they are being told that they must move – either to return immediately to East Timor or resettle elsewhere in Indonesia. The fact that refugees have chosen to stay in the camps despite the poor conditions and in spite of this government policy is indicative of the vast uncertainties associated with leaving the camps.

Oxfam GB, in collaboration with a local partner, Centre for Internally Displaced People Service/CIS, and Jesuit Refugee Service, organised a survey to find out what is blocking the pursuit of successful durable solutions and to offer the refugees a chance to voice their concerns.

On the one hand, although repatriated refugees have successfully re-integrated into their home communities in East Timor, our interviews revealed that the rumour mill and the absence of unbiased and appropriate information in West Timor continue to pose obstacles for those who wish to return. Despite the keen desire to return home, many remain sceptical – even fearful – of what lies in wait in East Timor.

On the Indonesia side, the basic requirements have yet to be met. There is no infrastructure, basic services or options for getting a livelihood. Nor is there any acceptance by the local population of the need to accommodate the refugees, and help them get a viable and secure standard of living. Already there have been several cases of locally resettled refugees abandoning settlement sites as a result of friction with the local population.

What is clear from our interviews is that not only do the refugees lack durable solutions, they simply do not have enough information to know which option holds the best chance for a secure future. Lack of information leaves refugees vulnerable to continued deprivation as well as potential intimidation and coercion.

In the meantime, as of January 2003, with violence no longer a threat, a cessation clause on refugee status has been invoked by UNHCR, UN refugees agency. This means that the East Timorese in Indonesia are no longer entitled to international protection as refugees." (Oxfam G-B January 2003)

Struggle for Independence in Papua

Displacement in Papua (March 2002)

- An estimated 16,600 persons are displaced in Papua, most of them from the Maluku. IDPs from Papua have resettled in Biak and other places, while IDPs from the Maluku face integration problems.
- 17,000 IDPs hosted in Irian Jaya at the end of December 2000. Half from Moluccas, half from Irian Jaya.
- Name "Papua" still not official.
- Violence erupted in June 2000 after negotiations on West Papua's sovereignty broke down.
- October violence in Wamena caused deaths and displacement of 10,000, most of them transmigrants seeking shelter in military, police post or mosques and churches.

"Papua has the poorest health standards of all Indonesian provinces, including the highest infant mortality and maternal mortality rates as well as the highest and fastest growing HIV rates. The number of IDPs in Papua is modest, some 4,027 families, 16,600 persons, mostly from the Maluku. A number of these were originally from Papua, and have resettled in Biak and other places, while ethnic Moluccans find it more difficult to integrate and are not always welcomed by the host communities." (EU March 2002, p. 65)

"The province of Irian Jaya hosted some 17,000 displaced persons at the end of 2000. At least half were from Irian Jaya itself; others were from the Moluccas and elsewhere. Irian Jaya also absorbed the return of some Irianese (Papuan) refugees from neighboring Papua New Guinea. A resistance movement has operated in Irian Jaya since Indonesia took control of the region in 1963.

In 1999, Wahid said he would begin calling the province West Papua, to reflect the wishes of many of its people. However, the Indonesian parliament has not formally adopted the name, and Wahid has said that the name has not been officially changed.

At a June 2000 congress in Jayapura, the Irian Jaya capital, more than 500 tribal leaders declared the independence of West Papua and called for international recognition of their sovereignty. Wahid attempted negotiations, but the talks broke down and violence soon erupted again.

In early October, violence between police and pro-independence Papuans in the town of Wamena caused the deaths of 26 people and led more than 10,000 civilians to seek shelter. Many were in military and police posts, while others were in mosques or churches. Wamena was virtually emptied of its inhabitants. Most or all of the displaced were believed to be transmigrants. Weeks after the incident, international NGOs still did not have access to the displaced. A government official said the displaced were in squalid conditions and faced hunger if rice did not reach them soon.

At the end of the year, Irian Jaya also hosted nearly 4,000 displaced persons from the Moluccas. Most were on a relatively inaccessible island off Sorong, on the western tip of Irian Jaya. A large number of Moluccan families have been in Sorong for generations, making it a logical destination for persons fleeing the sectarian strife. However, much of the Sorong community was reportedly unhappy with the influx. Some of the displaced moved on to Tual in Southeast Maluku." (USCR 19 June 2001)

POPULATION FIGURES AND PROFILE

Global figures

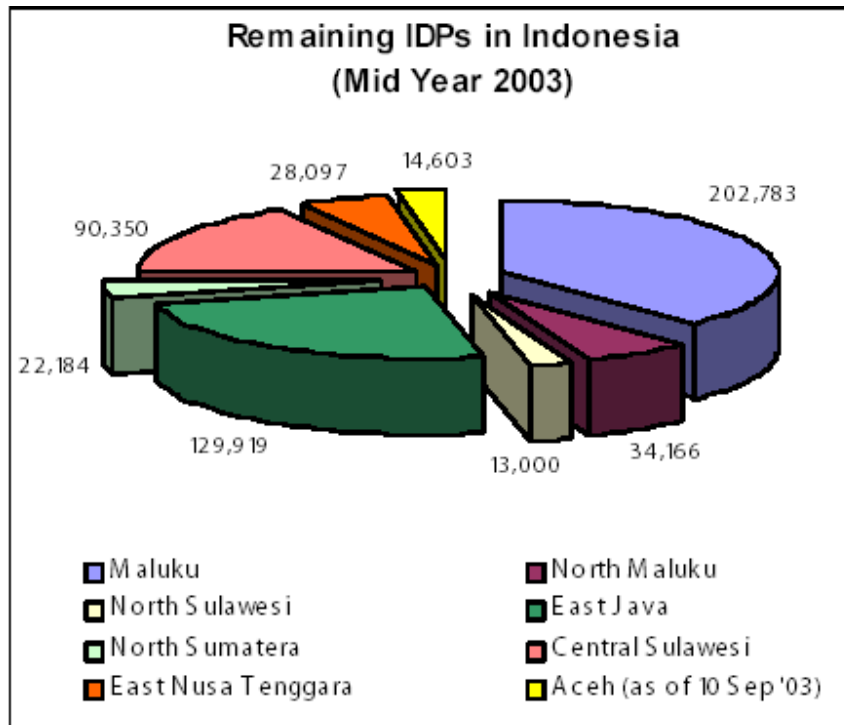

Over 500,000 people still displaced in Indonesia in 2004

- The United Nations will during 2004 use a working figure of 535,000 IDPs although the government, since January 2004, consider these as "vulnerable people"
- The 535,000 figure is the result of UN-Government assessment missions conducted in all IDP-affected areas during 2003 and of a workshop on management of IDPs held in mid-2003.

Between December 2002 and April 2003, Bakornas PBP and OCHA conducted joint missions in all IDP-affected areas to assess the current conditions of IDPs as well as their numbers. These visits concluded that there were an estimated 740,000 IDPs left in the country. During a workshop on management of IDPs, held in Sukabumi on 19-20 June 2003, the figures were revised and reduced to 535,000, which is the operational figure used by the United Nations for the 2004 Consolidated Appeal. Although IDPs are as of January 2004 classified as "vulnerable people" and central government funding for them is no longer available, the United Nations will continue during 2004 to consider them as displaced persons.

Situation as of 2004

"Between February and May 2003, the Coordinating Board for Disaster Relief and IDPs/Refugees (BAKORNAS PBP) and OCHA-Indonesia conducted joint missions to all major IDP locations, namely Central Sulawesi, East Java/Madura, East Nusa Tenggara (ENT, also known as Nusa Tenggara Timur or NNT), Maluku, North Maluku (North Sulawesi), North Sumatra and West Kalimantan. The main purpose of the missions was to ascertain the number of IDPs and discuss the current situation, achievements, and remaining needs with officials, IDPs and humanitarian actors in the field. The missions confirmed a reduction by over 50% in the number of IDPs since late 2002 and found that peace-building initiatives by UN agencies and NGOs had contributed significantly to improving stability. UNDP and UNICEF's support for peace building and peace education activities in Maluku and North Maluku enabled youth from Muslim and Christian communities to stage joint cultural events and encouraged a participatory approach to problem solving. The missions also identified six common continuing concerns: reconciliation; protection and security; land ownership and housing; coordination, information and data collection; assistance; and longer term planning for economic recovery and development. The findings of the missions were shared and discussed with senior government officials, donors, UN agencies, international organisations and NGOs at a "Follow up Workshop on the Management of IDPs in Indonesia" held in Sukabumi on 19-20 June 2003. The workshop made a number of recommendations for future action. Two of the broad themes were: 1) the need to provide long-term assistance and general support for the populations and areas affected by conflict; and 2) the need to reconcile communities divided by conflict. These themes have been weaved into the strategic goals/objectives of the CHAP for 2004.

Source: OCHA 9 April 2004, p. 8

Most of the 535,000 people who remained displaced in mid-2003 have lost their productive assets as a direct consequence of conflict or in exchange for food and will require humanitarian and recovery assistance during 2004. Security concerns and the lack of resources in areas of origin constitute the largest constraints to the return process. The weak capacities of the administration, inter-communal tensions, poor or non-existent social facilities and services, and corruption, are other obstacles to finding durable solutions to the plight of IDPs and affected communities. Although the GoRI has made significant efforts to find solutions to internal displacement by the end of 2003, considerable numbers of people remain displaced, particularly in Madura and Maluku. In Central Kalimantan for instance, Dayak communities continue to oppose the return of the Madurese who fled in early 2001. In Central Sulawesi, Maluku and North Maluku, lingering hatred, fear and revenge are major obstacles to the return of IDPs to their home areas. As of 01 January 2004, Central Government funding for IDPs will no longer be available, and it will be up to each affected Province to deal with the remaining problems. While GoRI recommends reclassifying the remaining IDPs as “vulnerable people” in order to reduce the feeling of dependency, their classification as IDPs will continue to apply for the purpose of this Common Humanitarian Action Plan.” (OCHA 9 April 2004, pp.6-7)

Note: This graph shows the variation of IDPs number from February 2000 to December 2003. The figures are based on the WFP/VAM Unit monthly "IDP Source and Recipient Regions" maps up to October 2002. The May 2003 figures reflects the findings of the joint Bakornas PBP-OCHA missions conducted from December 2002 to May 2003. This figure has been reduced to 586,769 during the June 2003 workshop and later in the year to 535,000.

General description and demographics of IDPs in the WFP Survey (June 2002)

- Almost half of the displaced live in rural settings and the other half in urban areas.
- 39% of the IDPs reside in camps the other living with relatives, friends, or in a self-owned or rented house..
- The average age of the displaced is 40.5 years.
- The average duration of displacement for IDPs households is 18 months, ranging from 1 to 69 months.
- 18% have access to land for growing food while 82 % do not.

[The following information is taken from a survey documenting livelihood aspects of internally displaced persons (IDPs) throughout fourteen provinces and fifty districts of Indonesia. The survey was commissioned by the World Food Programme in coordination with Bakornas, with assistance from the provincial and district authorities, and international and national NGOs and released in June 2002.]

"The survey includes a total of 5,506 IDP households (comprising 26,012 individuals). The synthesis includes 5,461 households. Of this total, the proportion living in rural settings is about equal to those living in urban environments (52 and 48 %, respectively). A large number of the IDP households reside in camps (39% or 2,123 households) while the remaining households live in various non-camp settings with relatives, host households, or in a self-owned or rented house. There are 689 IDP families living with non-relative host households (12% of the sample) and 1,229 (22%) living with relatives. The remaining 1,263 (23%) IDP families live in their own house, or rented accommodation. The average age of IDP household heads is 40.5 years. The average duration of displacement for IDP households is 18 months, ranging from 1 to 69 months. Fewer than 2 percent of IDPs have been displaced longer than 31 months.

Overall, 977 households (18%) have access to land for growing food. Of these, 344 households live in a camp setting and 633 households live outside of camps, accounting for 6.3 percent and 11.6 percent of the sample population, respectively. Of the 4,484 households (82%) that do not have access to land, 1,779 households are living in camps and 2,705 live with host households or in their own homes (39% and 49% of IDPs overall, respectively)." "The households participating in the survey represent 60 ethnic groups from Indonesia. Seven ethnic groups (Madurese, Moluccan, Javanese, Timorese, Butonese, Bugis and Acehnese) comprise nearly three-quarters of the sample population. Of the remaining 53 ethnic groups in the sample, 6 comprise less than 2 percent each of all households and 47 groups comprise less than 1 percent." (WFP June 2002, p. 5)

The overall age of IDP head of households is 40.5 years, and family size averages 4.8 per household (Table 3). Ages and household sizes are nearly identical for camp and non-camp households." Displacement from Maluku province

Number of IDPs in Maluku Province (2004)

- As of October 2003, the figures presented by the Government showed a total of 180,000 IDPs who have not yet received compensation.
- As of June 2003, the remaining number of IDPs in the Maluku province was estimated by Bakornas/OCHA at 202,000
- According to the Governor's office there were 332,548 IDPs in the Maluku province as of March 2003.

As of end-2003, the total number of IDPs in the Maluku province is estimated at between 180,000 and 200,000 .

New violence displace some 10,000 people in Ambon (April 2004)

"Four days of violence have already created a wave of displacement in the province. According to the Social Welfare Department of Ambon city council, over 10,600 people (2300 families) have fled their homes to safer locations within the city. Some of these IDPs had recently been relocated after being displaced a number of times." (OCHA 30 April 2004)

"Though limited, the return and resettlement/relocation of IDPs have started to areas where the GoRI has provided housing or to other areas where individuals are welcomed. However, according to GoRI's figures, 202,783 persons are still displaced, most of whom live in IDP camp sites, temporary housing provided by the authorities, with friends and relatives, or in abandoned private company premises in and outside of Ambon City. Also, some IDPs who took refuge in East Java and North Sulawesi, South East Sulawesi, North Maluku and Papua are still waiting to return to Maluku." (OCHA 9 April 2004, p. 18)

"According to the Maluku Media Centre, the head of the Provincial Social Departement, Drs. A.R. Uluputty, confirms that at the moment there are still 71.398 refugee families. "Only" 35.070 of these are currently being taken care of by the Social Department. An additional number of refugees is still staying outside the Moluccas. Uluputty further declared that the central government in Jakarta will extend its support financing refugees' returning to their original homesteads in 2004." (CCDA 4 February 2004)

Of the 331,979 displaced, a total of 152,438 (79,123+73,315) have received compensation from the government that are: House Material [HM] and Living Guarantee [LG] in the form of money. This leaves a remaining 179,541 unassisted IDPs in the province.

202,800 IDPs in Maluku province as of July 2003

"Of the some 332,000 IDPs (64,000 families) displaced within Maluku, around 129, 800 IDPs (24,940 families) had returned, of the remaining 202,800 IDPs/ 39,000 families, 19,400 (34,500 families) plan to return in the near future. Assistance packages in accordance with the Government's programme of 3.75 million IDR per family, provided by both the Department of Social Affairs and the Department of Manpower and Transmigration, had only been received by 10,000 families as at the end of 2002 from the total estimate of 64,000 families entitled to assistance. Of the 13,800 IDP families that were displaced within Ambon, some 7,000 families had returned home, and around 3,500 had been relocated.

However, it is recognised some data is unreliable due to re-registrations and false registrations. Creating accurate data sets and eligibility criteria for assistance are now major priorities for the Pokja." (Bakornas & OCHA, July 2003, p. 13)

332,548 IDPs in Maluku province as of April 2003

"Over the last two years, the situation has become more stable and conducive to finding durable solutions for IDPs, though the security situation especially in Ambon city remains tense. Though limited, the return and the resettlement/relocation of IDPs have started to the areas where the Government has provided housing or to other areas where individuals are welcome. The latest number of IDPs provided by the Governor's office is: 332,548 persons (63,971 families). Most of them remain in IDP camps/sites, temporary housing provided by the Government, abandoned private company premises in and outskirts of Ambon city or houses of friends and relatives." The survey was commissioned by the World Food Programme in coordination with Bakornas, with assistance from the provincial and district authorities, and international and national NGOs and released in June 2002.

Details on the number and locations of IDPs in Buru (October 2003)

- Some 634 families are still displaced on Buru Island, 40% originate from the island and fled violence in Ambon while the rest are Buton Ambonese willing to stay and integrate.
- There remain 2 small camps of 10-20 families each and monitoring has concluded that these families are not vulnerable as they are involved in trading and labor jobs.
- Other small groups of IDPs are scattered outside Namlea.

"Namlea

The latest numbers from the Social Department claim that 634 families are still registered as IDP families living in and around Namlea town. Roughly 40% are Buru natives who were working in Ambon at the time of the conflict and came back to Buru. The other 60% are Buton Ambonese who came to Buru with the start of the conflict and want to remain on Buru. Many of these are targeted to receive relocation housing. The Social Department reports that there are plans for additional housing to be built in nearby Jiku Besar, Karang Jaya, Sinahoni, etc and it waits only for the government housing assistance monies to be distributed. They said construction could begin within September.

There remain 2 small camps of 10-20 families each and monitoring has concluded that these families are not vulnerable as they are involved in trading and labor jobs. Those not in camps are reportedly renting housing in the area and or are living with relatives, and or have merely commandeered an unoccupied house. It is also possible that a number have returned to Ambon now that the situation has improved and reconstruction is underway.

We have visited the 11 dusuns of Namlea to track down 'real' IDP populations around Namlea but getting official numbers has been difficult. As we were told, IDPs register when they arrive, but do not inform when they leave. Numbers are generally still around the 600 plateau.

Concerning the Christians formerly living in Namlea town; the majority was living in Kosambi area in Sehe, and others were in the Namatek area and apparently owned a considerable amount of land. It is reported that a number of Christians have sold their properties, while others have had their land taken, and others have family living on their land. Information supplied by the IDP coordinating body for Namlea estimated that more or less 100 Christian families lived in Namlea before the conflict but accurate numbers are estimates only.

IDPs outside Namlea

In the North West, (Air Buaya) there are 20+ families at Waikase who are apparently resettling in the area. There are also scattered families but no large collection of families waiting to return.

In the North East (Waplau and Namlea) there are for example 23 families at Hatawano, down from the 50 registered in April. In Samalagi the number is 8, dropping from 41.

In the North South (WaiApu) one village Tifu, destroyed during the conflict remains uninhabited. They have received new houses though as yet the community remains living in displacement. The Christian community is in Kampung Baru and the Muslim community lives scattered.

In the South, (Madam, Leksula, Namrole) the most significant numbers are in Waemulang (204) and in Leksula (127). The 204 families are from 4 Christian villages; Air Besar (29), Siopot (79), Emguhen (52), and Malilae (44). They are living in traditional housing a half kilometer behind Waemulang. They plan to return, but wait for housing assistance. They have established gardens around Waemulang. They are not fisherman. The families in Leksula are from many locations, Ambon, Namlea, and North Buru generally and are living with families.

Elsewhere in the south (Leksula) 34 families are in Nalbessy; Buton families which were living in Leksula before the conflict. There are more or less 50 families scattered in various villages in the Namrole area but these are Muslim returnees to Labuang who live nearby while reconstructing housing." (ACF October 2003)

Details on the number and locations of IDPs in Ambon Island (June 2004)

- According to the government, the April 2004 violence displaced an estimated 10,000 additional people in Ambon.
- PMI reports only 4,000 displaced.
- The IDP population in Ambon is estimated at 160,000 as of June 2003

- Conflict has reinforced a trend to mono-community areas, and segregation between Christians and Moslems is now very high.
- 34% of the total population of Ambon Island is IDP (1/3 of the Island population).
- The most important concentration of IDP is found in the Kelurahan-town (the proportion of IDP versus local population is usually above 50%).
- Around 20-25% of the IDP population is living in camps therefore in precarious situation.
- In Ambon 86% of the IDPs are originating from the island

"The violence left 40 people dead and over 300 people injured. Several bombs exploded in public places while police defused a number of unexploded bombs. Muslim and Christian communities have drawn invisible demarcation lines dividing Ambon city along the religious lines. The Government has reported some 10,000 newly displaced people while the Indonesian Red Cross (PMI) put this number at 4,000 IDPs. Many of these people have been displaced for a number of times and lost their belongings time and again, and will continue relying on the assistance programmes for some time to come." "Ambon Island generalities

Main generalities about Ambon Island:

The Island surface is 763 Km² (42km length on 22km width). From the center of the town it takes 2.5 hours to reach by car the most distant village (the roads are in good conditions in general except the mountains roads and some remote areas).

Ambon Island is divided in two districts (Ambon Kotamadya and Maluku Tenggara). (See map: Administrative limits).

Two sub-districts (Salahutu and Leihitu) depend on Maluku Tenggara district (which capital is Masohi situated in Seram Island). The three other sub-districts (Nusaniwe, Sirimau and Teluk Ambon Baguala) depend on Ambon Kotamadya (Ambon municipality district).

Ambon Island is composed of 50 villages -Desa- (villages themselves composed of many sub-villages - Dusun- (around 100 in all Ambon)) and 20 Kelurahan.

The segregation is very high in Ambon. The map: Ambon Desa-Kelurahan and community division shows how the island is divided into Moslem and Christian areas. This kind of division was already existing before the conflict (i.e. area predominant Christian around Ambon town; predominant Moslem in the north of Ambon) but the conflict has reinforced this trend to mono-community areas.

Ambon Island population: Local, IDP, Returnees and Resettled

According to the above table few general remarks:

The total population of Ambon Island is estimated at more than 95,000 families (475,000 people) including the IDP.

34% of the total population of Ambon Island is IDP (1/3 of the Island population).

Compared to the situation before 1999 (before riots), the local population demography has decreased of more than 15,000 families. It could signify that more than 100,000 people have been displaced within Ambon Island.

(not in the table) The most important concentration of IDP is found in the Kelurahan-town (the proportion of IDP versus local population is usually above 50%).

IDP camps, resettlement and returnees situation in Ambon Island (May-June 2003)

According to the above table few general remarks:

17% of the IDP population is living in camps therefore in precarious situation. We can estimate that this data is higher in reality, around 20/25% (isolated families living in a destroyed or empty building). The other IDPs are living in their own house or with relatives.

According to the total number of IDP families living in Ambon we can observe the very low rate of families resettled (4%) and already returned to their original place (2%).

The observation of the map: IDP camps, resettlement & returnees site in Ambon shows a concentration of IDP mainly camps in town and from the town until Passo (the Isthmus and crossroad of the Island). An important proportion of resettlement site are found in the periphery of Ambon (Stain area) due to the space available there. This area should be even denser in the future.

NB: in Ambon 86% of the IDPs are originating from the island." (ACF June 2003)

Number of IDPs in Southeast Sulawesi: Muna, Koloka, Kendari, Buton (October 2002)

- The majority of the estimated 150,000 IDPs from the Moluccas are living with local families in Buton district.
- The displaced chose Buton as their refuge as many originated from there three generations ago.

"Around 103,000 displaced people from Ambon arrived in Southeast Sulawesi, fleeing violence between Christians and Muslims in Ambon in the Moluccas islands. The majority of IDPs from the Moluccas (approximately 150,000) are living with local families in Buton district. The displaced chose Buton as their refuge as many originated from there three generations ago. The arrival of IDPs from Ambon has created pockets of tension on the small island.

Close family links between Ambon and Sulawesi have helped to ease tension between displaced and local families. But resentment is growing among local residents over being forced to share health, education and other basic services. The population of Buton has grown by 21 per cent since the influx of the displaced. Many families complain that school class sizes are getting bigger, which is affecting the quality of education. In the area where Save the Children works, 24 per cent of displaced children are not attending school and their dropout rate is 47 per cent. " (SCF 20 July 2001)

IDPs in South Sulawesi (Makassar, Bone) (October 2002)

- 15,000 IDPs in South Sulawesi, majority of whom are from East Timor, while the rest is from Central Sulawesi.
- Most food assistance to East Timorese is contributed by businesses or local NGOs, while no UN agency or international NGOs have provided assistance.
- Most Ambonese students unable to continue their studies in Ambon due to violence. No funds were made available to enable the displaced students to resume their studies elsewhere.

As of the end of October 2002, the total number of IDPs in South Sulawesi was estimated by WFP/VAM Unit to stand at 36,104.

IDPs in Bone

Note: The following information is drawn from a survey documenting livelihood aspects of internally displaced persons (IDPs) throughout fourteen provinces and fifty districts of Indonesia. The survey was commissioned by the World Food Programme in coordination with Bakornas, with assistance from the provincial and district authorities, and international and national NGOs and released in June 2002.

"Nearly 15,000 persons were displaced in the province of South Sulawesi as of December 2000, according to WFP figures. An unknown number were in and around Ujung Pandang, the capital, also known by its historical name, Makassar. The majority of the displaced were from East Timor. Most others were from Central Sulawesi (primarily fleeing the conflicts in Poso), while some were from Ambon. [...]"

East Timorese

USCR visited a camp for East Timorese Muslims in Makassar. The camp held 130 people (33 families). (About 10 percent of East Timor's population prior to the referendum was Muslim). The camp spokespersons said they were pro-Indonesia and did not support the independence of East Timor. They said they and other East Timorese currently in Makassar had been there since March and were the "sixth wave" to go there from West Timor, where they went following the independence referendum and ensuing violence. They said the previous groups had been transmigrated by the government to Luwuk, in Central Sulawesi, and that they expected to be transmigrated as well.

The East Timorese said they have received some money from the government but that it has been very irregular. Most food assistance, they said, is contributed by businesses or local NGOs. Medical care is available at the local hospital. The displaced said that no UN agencies or international NGOs have provided assistance. The East Timorese said they left West Timor because the camp conditions there were bad and no land was available. Most of those interviewed by USCR said they want to stay in Indonesia rather than return to an independent East Timor and are willing to go anywhere the government sends them. Some, however, said they may consider returning to East Timor in a few years if it is stable and if their safety can be guaranteed.

Because they have retained Indonesian citizenship and are availing themselves of Indonesia's protection by voluntarily participating in the transmigration program, the East Timorese in Makassar—like those in Bali—are generally considered internally displaced persons rather than refugees. [...]"

Ambonese

USCR interviewed two displaced persons from Ambon in Makassar, both Muslim and both students who were studying at the local university. Originally students in Ambon, they fled to Makassar with their families in 1999. They told USCR that most students, both Christian and Muslim, were unable to continue their studies in Ambon because of the violence. At the students' prompting, the education minister in Jakarta directed all Indonesian universities to accept any student leaving Pattimura University in Ambon. However, the students said no funds were made available to facilitate this.

They said that about 400 students and their families had gone to Makassar. About 300 are Muslim, the rest Christian. Most are living with other relatives or, in many cases, the relatives of friends.

The situation, they said, puts a great strain on the host families, especially because no assistance is provided by the government. [...]" (USCR January 2001, pp. 24-25)

Displacement from North Maluku province

Some 34,000 people still displaced in North Maluku province (2004)

According to the findings of a joint mission conducted by Bakornas PBP and OCHA in North Maluku and North Sulawesi in May 2003, the total number of people displaced was estimated at 49,580 in North Maluku and 2,865 in North Sulawesi. However, these figures were corrected a month later during a workshop on IDP management. They were reduced to 34,166 for North Maluku and augmented to 13,000 for North Sulawesi. In addition some 5,000 people uprooted from North Maluku are still displaced in Ambon.

See "Remaining IDP Numbers in Indonesia (Year 2003)", Annex III, in Follow Up Workshop on the Management of IDPs in Indonesia, 19-20 June 2003, Bakornas PBP & OCHA, July 2003, p. 37

"The province of North Maluku followed a positive trend towards recovery throughout 2003. Of the over 200,000 persons displaced by the conflict in North Maluku, approximately three-quarters have returned, with some 34,166 persons remaining displaced within North Maluku and another 13,000 persons in North Sulawesi." (OCHA 9 April 2004, p. 20)

"The schedule for returning home for the displaced people of northern Moluccas (Indonesia) remains merely a plan without a clear timetable for its completion, writes JRS Moluccas. Indeed, the return home is long overdue: the original plan had the displaced community returning by 20 August 2003, but the camps in Ambon, housing those displaced from northern Moluccas are still full, without any explanation as to why the return has been delayed. This community of around 1,000 families, or 5,000 individuals, has been displaced for almost four years." (JRS 15 October 2003)

"Department of Settlement and Regional Infrastructure has estimated that some 23,300 homes were destroyed during the conflict. Of those displaced as a consequence, over 12,000 families have returned to rebuild their homes. A remaining 1,900 families continue to be displaced in North Maluku, 2,600 families in North Sulawesi (not including those that have received a "Termination Fund") and around 1,100 families fled to Maluku Province. In addition, 329 families of IDPs from Maluku Province fled to North Maluku. The main focus on returns has been rural displacements and IDPs in Ternate (capital city) to Tobelo; and those displaced in Tobelo to their original communities especially Ternate. At this time around 70% of those displaced from Tobelo have returned. Of those who have returned spontaneously to Galela, Obi and Bacan the greater part are civil servants (including teachers). There are still some 4,400 remaining IDP families in Ternate. Assistance for remaining IDPs in North Sulawesi will be provided but costs of repatriation are yet to be settled between the authorities of the two provinces. But there have also been setbacks, such as the clashes in Morotai, causing IDPs to return to their displacement sites in Tobelo." (Bakornas PBP & OCHA July 2003, pp. 13-14)

During the June 2003 workshop on IDP management, this figure was corrected to 13,000. Other more recent data suggest that the number could be higher, closer to 22,000.

Displacement from Aceh province

Officially, 123,000 people displaced by the military operation since May 2003 (June 2004)

- According to figures provided by Satkorlak, the Provincial Disaster Management Coordination Unit, as of 13 February 2004 a total of 123,000 people had been displaced since May, and 6,000 IDP remained in camps.
- These figures do not include those who have fled to the forest or sought refuge with relatives and have not been independently verified.

As of June 2004, the official displacement figures for Aceh stand at around 7,000 people, 2,500 of whom stay in official camps. Since May 2003, a total of 125,000 people have been displaced.

"IOM reported that the current number of IDPs is 6,946 persons (2,520 persons of them have been registered in South Aceh, East Aceh, and Aceh Jaya, while another 4,426 persons were not registered by SATKORLAK as they were staying outside the camps with relatives in West Aceh, Aceh Singkil, East Aceh, and Nagan Raya districts)." (OCHA 12 June 2004)

"Over the last several months, there was gradual decline in the IDPs number (some 2,500 IDPs) in camps. However, temporary displacement and people displaced but living with friends and relatives are not accounted for in the IDP statistics." (OCHA 30 April 2004)

"IOM reported that as of Wednesday (31 Mar.), the total number of IDPs is 2,590 persons (615 HH) in several camps all over the province." (OCHA 3 April 2004)

"As of 19 August 2003, according to IOM/Satkorlak figures, there have been 106,758 internally displaced persons (IDPs), of whom 88,206 have returned. Groups of IDPs remain, reportedly scattered, in 26 camps in South Aceh (6,737 persons), Aceh Jaya (2,534 persons), Aceh Tamiang (1,777 persons), Aceh Singkil (1,159 persons), and West Aceh (1,145 persons). According to IOM reports, the number of IDPs Bireuen district, which used to have the highest number of IDPs, has dropped dramatically.

These numbers, however, only include IDPs in designated camps; many displaced have sought refuge with relatives or are in camps that are not managed by the martial law administration. For example, 3,780 persons from Pasie Raja Sub-district in South Aceh sought refuge with host families. There have also been reliable reports of people fleeing into the forests. Furthermore, the figures do not account for displacement to other regions of Indonesia and asylum-seekers in other countries." (ICVA 5 September 2003, p. 1)

In April 2003, prior to the launching of the military operation, the number of persons displaced in settlements in Aceh was estimated by the Bureau of Nation's Unity and People's Protection to stand at 20,238 IDPs. According to the table below, some 550,488 persons are considered as returnees. However, these are cumulated figures over the last years and do not reflect the current displacement situation.

Around 100,000 IDPs in North Sumatra (April 2003)

- Provincial authorities are in the process of undertaking verification exercise and expected to reveal the verified IDP numbers by May 2003
- According to the latest figures by the Government of Indonesia, the total number of IDPs in North Sumatra at the end of October 2002 was estimated to stand at 122,265.
- In addition to displacement in Aceh, IDPs have also fled to North Sumatra. The non-Acehnese (mainly Java trans-migrants) felt threatened by the GAM or native Acehnese and are now unwilling to return. 500 of them arrived in Medan in January 2000. Other IDPs include native Acehnese who have fled the military violence.

According to the latest figures (end-October 2002) provided by Satkorlak, the total number of IDPs in North Sumatra was estimated to stand at 122,265.

"Background of the Conflict: Decades long conflict among various fractions caused insecurity problems for many Javanees trans-migrants as well as local residents. Free Aceh Movement (GAM) threats, intimidation, destruction of properties and lives lead many non Acehnese residents to flee their homes. Most IDPs found refuge in the neighboring N. Sumatra province. Reportedly, the first wave of noticeable displacement started in 1999 and the forced displacement continued for the last three years at varied scale. A fairly large caseload of Acehnese IDPs arrived in N. Sumatra during 2001. IDPs are neither located in camps/shelter nor in the town/growth centers rather spread all over the province. The largest concentration of IDPs is in Langkat district. There is no established figure for the total number of IDPs in the province, as registration and de-registration has not been done in a credible and systematic way. The provincial authorities are in the process of undertaking verification exercise and expected to reveal the verified IDP numbers by May 2003." (OCHA April 2003, p. 1)

The following graphic illustrates the variations on the number of IDPs in North Sumatra from February 2000 to October 2002, based on figures provided by Bakornas and Satkorlak and used in the WFP/VAM Unit "IDP Source and Recipient Regions" maps.

Displacement from Central Sulawesi province

Some 90,000 IDPs could still be in need of assistance in Central Sulawesi (2004)

- Following a workshop on IDP management held in June 2003, some 90,000 were found to still be in need of assistance.
- OCHA/Bakornas mission conducted in March 2003 estimated the IDP figure at 36,000.

A mission conducted jointly by Bakornas PBP and OCHA in March 2003 with the objective to assess numbers concluded that most IDPs had returned and that only 36,000 people remained displaced in Central Sulawesi. However, during a workshop on management of IDPs, held in June 2003, it was found that some 90,000 people were still in need of assistance.

"Of the registered IDPs in Poso 4,000 households remain that have not received the JADUP/BEDUP allowance. This assistance for the IDPs is being provided by the Central Government through the Social Ministry." (OCHA April 2004)

"After four years of intermittent violence, large-scale property destruction and displacement (temporary, partial and continuing) of some 157,000 people, the province is gradually moving towards normality. Some 50% of destroyed homes have been rebuilt, markets, schools and government facilities have re-established services, and movement is generally safe and free from harassment or intimidation at least during daylight hours. SATKORLAK reported that more than 18,070 families (90,350 people) are still waiting for livelihood and capital assistance from the government, but many of these are thought to have left the district or the province altogether. Like in many other provinces in Indonesia, the lack of reliable and consistent data remains a key obstacle in determining IDPs numbers and their needs in Central Sulawesi." (OCHA 9 April 2004, p.15)

"During the course of the violence over the last four years IDP figures in Central Sulawesi have fluctuated with both partial and full returns followed by new waves of displacement, as violence re-flared. Currently the Provincial Government's total estimate is 31,326 families, of whom 13,256 families have received livelihood and capital assistance, leaving a balance of 18,070 families (90,350 persons). In addition, around 5,000 are displaced in neighbouring provinces." (Bakornas PBP & OCHA July 2003, p. 18)

"In Central Sulawesi the return option has proved to be more successful with continued support from the government at all levels. Thus far, out of 31,326 families (143,354 persons), a total of 25,790 families (107,283 persons) have returned to their places of origin, and have begun to resume their lives.

The mission found that the trend is positive and that the return process continues, although at a slower pace than expected. This is due to the fragility of the situation, mistrust that exist within communities, the fact that many IDPs have been displaced three or four times over the last two to three years, and lack of resources and basic social services." (Bakornas & OCHA March 2003, p. 2)

"In late December 2001 representatives of the Christian and Muslim communities signed a peace agreement (Malino I). By this time 110,000 persons were displaced, and 60 schools and 11,000 homes damaged or burnt to the ground. Between January and June of 2002 there were no major incidents. This period allowed for a significant number of returns (approximately 40,000). In June 2002, several incidents of unprovoked attacks led to the resurgence in community fear and general instability, including more displacements. The situation remains tense and humanitarian action in the short-term will be constrained by this volatility.

Return and resettlement choices are made on the basis of security and the economic incentive of returning to productive assets. In many cases children and wives are left behind for schooling and house garden production while the husband (there are also a significant number of widows) returns to agricultural work at the place of origin. But most IDPs wish to make a permanent return. The majority of IDPs are currently living with host families (54,500) in the Poso District, where some 30% of the population have been displaced. Some 11,000 IDPs have been "housed" in crowded purpose-built barracks and the remainder fled to other districts, and to North and South Sulawesi." (UNOCHA 19 November 2002, p. 12)

Displacement from West Kalimantan province

Majority of the 78,000 displaced ethnic Madurese has been relocated in 12 sites and become "settlers" (2004)

- Of the estimated 78,000 ethnic Madurese displaced in 1999 and accommodated in public facilities in Pontianak up to June 2002, most have been relocated to 12 sites and been referred to as "settlers". Some 1,259 households have chosen to avail from the government empowerment package.

"A conflict between ethnic Malay and Dayak groups on the one side, and ethnic Madurese migrants on the other, erupted in 1999 in Sambas and Singkawang, West Kalimantan, causing 78,000 Madurese to flee from their homes to the provincial capital Pontianak where they were accommodated in public facilities until June 2002. After the murder of several Madurese who had returned to Sambas to dispose of their property, the possibility of a general return of the IDPs was ruled out. Therefore the GoRI, through the Department of Manpower and Transmigration and the Department of Resettlement and Regional Infrastructure, provided relocation housing for most IDPs in 12 relocation sites. In addition to housing, the GoRI also provided 11,000 families of agricultural background with two hectares of agricultural land per family. Since their move to relocation sites, IDPs are being referred to as "Settlers". A total of 1,259 households have chosen the alternative option of a government local settlement ("empowerment") package of IDR 5 million (US$ 600) per family to arrange their own accommodation and living." Displacement from Central Kalimantan province

130,000 IDPs remain in East Java (Madura Island) (2004)

- Current estimates put the number of Madurese IDPs displaced from Central Kalimantan to East Java at 130,000.
- Out of the 180,000 displaced from central Kalimantan in 2001, only 43,000 have been able to return as of end-2003

"A majority of the 180,000 people, displaced from Central Kalimantan to East Java province during the conflict between Dayaks (indigenous population) and Madurese (migrants) in early 2001, remain in displacement on mainland East Java and Madura Island (Sampang and Bangkalan districts). The IDPs are spread over 140 villages and mainly reside with host families and in camps (a smaller number) provided by the government and private institutions. Most IDPs have expressed the wish to return to their villages of origin once the security situation allows for their return. During 2002 and early 2003, some 43,400 IDPs have managed to return with nominal or no assistance from the government to selected places where the communities were ready to receive them and/or have found other solutions.

The provincial government has committed itself to finding alternative solutions in 2004 for the remaining 130,000 IDPs. The government has also issued regulations aimed at assisting the return of IDPs to the most severely affected districts through allocating financial resources, enhancing inter-provincial coordination, and promoting inter-community dialogue." (OCHA 9 April 2004, p 14)

"The SATKORLAK Secretary of the Provincial Government of East Java identified the IDPs in East Java into two groups:

- a. East Java Mainland IDPs
- b. Madura Island IDPs

The IDPs are spread out in approximately 140 villages. They have been residing with their own families, integrated with the community and host families, or are in temporary housing facilities built by the government or private companies in IDP sites/ camps. Out of the total number of IDPs, only 5% (approximately 600 households) are in IDP camps. The majority of the IDPs are integrated with their families and the community. Because of this, data of the number of IDPs in the community is difficult to monitor.

A. East Java Mainland

The number of IDP families in the East Java mainland as provided by the Satlkorlak dated January 2003 is 45,050 IDPs (14,504 households), in at least 10 districts (excluding Mojokerto).

(...)

B. Madura Island

There is a total of 128,919 IDPs in Madura Island, spread out in four districts, with the majority in Sampang District, as follows:

Sumenep District 1,951 people

Pemangkas District 2,459 people

Bangkalan District 38,248 people

Sampang District 86,261 people" (OCHA February 2003, pp. 2-3)

Displacement from Papua province

Displacement in and from Papua (June 2003)

- Papua is since January 2003 divided into three provinces.
- 16,870 people remain displaced, half of them originating from Papua, the other half having fled the Maluku.

"On January 27, 2003, President Sukarnoputri issued a decree dividing Papua into three separate provinces. The GOI's initiative was in response to Papua's continuing separatist movements spearheaded by the Free Papua Movement (OPM). While violent incidents continue, according to WFP, the number of IDPs in Papua remains at 16,870." (USAID 5 June 2003)

"The province of Irian Jaya hosted some 17,000 displaced persons at the end of 2000. At least half were from Irian Jaya itself; others were from the Moluccas and elsewhere." (USCR June 2001)

"West Papua (also known as Irian Jaya) is both hosting and producing internally displaced persons, in addition to adapting to the return of some Papuan refugees from Papua New Guinea. Nearly 4,000 of the displaced are from Maluku (primarily Ambon) and North Maluku. Most are on a relatively inaccessible island off Sorong, on the western tip of Papua. According to ICMC, which is providing services to the displaced, a large number of Moluccan families have been in Sorong for generations, making it a logical destination for persons fleeing the strife in the Maluku. However, much of the Sorong community has been unhappy with the influx. An initial group arrived in Sorong in January 2000 and were there for more than two months. In the absence of sufficient services, they fled onward to Tual in Southeast Maluku. A few months later, a new group arrived, having fled the latest violence." (USCR January 2001)

PATTERNS OF DISPLACEMENT

Displacement from Maluku Province

Inter-communal violence forced people to flee within Maluku province and to Southeast Sulawesi (July 2003)

- 3/4 of the displaced took refuge in IDP camps within the province, mainly in Ambon, while the rest fled to areas where they originally migrated from (Southeast Sulawesi)

"The IDP crisis in Maluku commenced following severe conflict between different religious communities starting in early 1999. In the following 12 months nearly all of the areas in Maluku were affected; some 30,000 homes and public infrastructure were destroyed. Displacement occurred to neighbouring Sulawesi, where the lives of IDPs have partially normalised. Apart from the large numbers of recent migrants or their descendants that returned to Sulawesi, around 332,000 fled to other parts of Maluku, or were displaced within Ambon. Further categories are those persons that fled from rural areas to other rural communities where they felt safe, and those persons that moved to Maluku from other provinces similarly affected by violence, notably North Maluku (just over 1,000 families)." (Bakornas & OCHA, July 2003, p. 12)

"The communal conflict has created a permanent change in the social fabric and mind-set of nearly every citizen of Maluku. Large sections of the population of 1.3 million have been affected by the violence. In Maluku, 330,000 people still remain in IDP camps and other temporary, inadequate accommodation. Another 160,000 fled the violence to the areas where they originally migrated from (mainly Southeast Sulawesi). Most IDPs continue to live in overcrowded and under-serviced conditions. Full economic, infrastructure and service recovery in Ambon, remote areas, and IDP influx sites are still many years distant." (UNOCHA 14 February 2003)

Displacement from North Maluku

Destination of displacement from North Maluku followed religious lines (July 2003)

- Thousands of Christians fled to neighbouring North Sulawesi and to Tobelo from all over the province, and thousands of Moslems were displaced from Tobelo and other areas to towns such as Ternate.
- From the initial estimate of more than 220,000 persons having fled either within the Province or to North Sulawesi, the majority have returned, to or nearby their original place of residence.

"From August 1999, North Maluku was ravaged by inter-communal strife, similar to that affecting Maluku. The roots of the violence contained its own local dynamic but the way it spread, pitting members of two religious communities against each other throughout the Province in the succeeding months, set off similar consequences to those suffered in Maluku. Thousands of Christians fled to neighbouring North Sulawesi and to Tobelo from all over the province, and thousands of Moslems were displaced from Tobelo and other areas to towns such as Ternate. Many areas still remain segregated along religious lines. The Provincial Government however has been able to encourage the return of the majority of the population, and in other instances different types of assistance have been provided. In North Maluku the major focus has been on returns, and from the initial estimate of more than 220,000 persons having fled either within the Province or to North Sulawesi, the majority have returned, to or nearby their original place of residence, many of them spontaneously, shortly after the end of the conflict." (Bakornas & OCHA July 2003, p. 13)

Displacement from Aceh

Many displaced have avoided the official camps (2004)

- Strategies of forced displacement have been used by the military in the hope of separating the civilians from GAM militants.
- Fear of becoming targets for the military many men have avoided the official camps and have sought refuge in the forests or mountains.
- Suspecting GAM of hiding militants in the camps or recruiting new members, the authorities have reportedly conducted search operations in the camps

"In an attempt to separate GAM from ordinary civilians, tens of thousands of villagers were forced by the military to leave their homes and live in camps. The logic behind removing all civilians from these targeted areas was that anyone not in the camps must be members or supporters of GAM. Fearing they would become easy targets, many men did not go to the camps, but instead fled to the forests and mountains. In this way the military actually 'pushed' people to live with, and perhaps join, the separatist movement, leaving the most vulnerable groups as the majority of the camp population. The authorities now suspect that some of these camps have become areas for GAM to hide and recruit new members. Search operations have become frequent occurrences, resulting in increasing levels of fear and insecurity for the residents. In addition, living conditions are poor, with residents complaining that food and water is in short supply." (Eye on Aceh April 2004)

Two distinctive patterns of displacement for Aceh IDPs (February 2003)

- 2 patterns of displacement: temporary displacement (mostly Acehnese) within Aceh province following armed clashes and long-term displacement to North Sumatra (mostly Javanese)
- Real long-term IDPs in Aceh are estimated to be around 30,000.
- Following armed clashes between government forces and GAM rebels, the villagers usually anticipate the return of these soldiers and flee until it is safe to return.
- Displacement in Aceh thus tends to be short-term and localized.

"The conflict has led to two distinctive patterns of displacement. Within Aceh Province, local people have in general been temporarily displaced when their villages were under (threat of) attack, and have been sheltered in mosques or community halls. These displaced persons have usually returned to their villages within a few weeks and started reconstructing their houses and livelihoods. At the same time, thousands of transmigrants, mostly of Javanese origin, who had settled in Central Aceh where the Government had provided each family with three hectares of land for agriculture and housing, were forced to leave for North Sumatra. These IDPs, whose numbers are estimated at close to 100,000, remain displaced in North Sumatra, and although they wish to return to Aceh, they do not yet believe that the situation is sufficiently secure." (UNOCHA 14 February 2003, p. 26)

"The neighbouring Province of Nanggroe Aceh Darussalam has suffered conflict during many decades, including violence in conjunction with a separatist movement since 1976. As a result many earlier migrants from other parts of Indonesia, had fled from this Province to North Sumatra, seeking refuge from the conflict or intimidation. An estimated 23,000 families have sought refuge in North Sumatra since the violence escalated in 1999." (Bakornas PBP & OCHA July 2003, p. 17)

"The real longterm IDPs in Aceh are no more than 30 000, representing people who have lost their houses or entire villages burnt by the government forces (TNI - military, or POLRI, national police with its combat units BRIMOB -mobile brigade, and GEGANA, special action unit), and some by the so-called 'Armed civilians gangs' (whose identity no one wants to own-up, the Indonesian side points fingers at GAM while GAM accuses the military for the purpose of provocations. The victims of these gangs are mostly non-Acehnese, and they have been transferred to other provinces in Indonesia, the number given varies between 15 000 to 20 000).

Every time there is a clash in Aceh, especially when there are casualties in the security forces, the security forces return and attack the village where the clash took place and brutalize the villagers. Because of incidents such as these, villagers have simply become so afraid of the military/police that they now leave their village as soon as they hear a military or police unit heading its direction, after an armed clash, or after a soldier or a policeman is injured or killed in or near their village. The villagers gather in mosques, schools, or open fields until they feel safe enough to return. As a result, the number of IDPs may suddenly swell from 30 000 to 60, 000 within a few days and dwindle down gradually, as they return, to the more constant figure of 30 000 or so IDPs. This cycle has been repeated itself several times, which explains the great fluctuations of figures you read from various reports. These figures are not necessarily inaccurate but must be analysed in view of the moment in the cycle of flight-and-return which give them meaning." (SCHRA 12 September 2000)

"Whole villages have been displaced by the fighting. Displacement in Aceh tends to be a short-term, localized phenomenon. Typically following a nearby clash between security forces and separatists, or simply the appearance of troops in the area, rural inhabitants travel to the nearest market town, often the subdistrict capital. They typically stay on the grounds of the mosque for days or months until they feel it is safe to return." (HRW May 2000)

Displacement in Central Sulawesi

IDPs in Central Sulawesi have mainly fled to regions where members of their religion make up the majority (March 2003)

- Demographic changes in Central Sulawesi have led to tensions and eruption of violence in 1998 and May 2000 between Christians and Muslims.
- Some 170 persons have been killed and 140,000 displaced.
- Residents fled to areas where members of their religion made up the majority: Muslims went to Palu, Poso town, and the coastal town of Parigi, while Christians fled to Tentena and Napu in the mountains, or Manado in North Sulawesi.

"Central Sulawesi is the largest province in the island of Sulawesi covering an area of 68 km² and inhabiting 2.1 million people. In addition to those who were settled through the GoRI transmigration policy of 1970s, economic migrants continued to arrive in Central Sulawesi throughout 1980s, mainly from neighbouring south Sulawesi. These new migrants purchased land and property and became part of the local population changing the demographic situation of the province. This demographic change caused economic and political competition which resulted in increased tension especially after the emergence of financial crisis.

These worrying trends led to the eruption of communal violence in several parts of Poso district in December 1998, which escalated in April and May 2000, killing some 170 people and injuring many others. The violence caused substantial property destruction and population displacement (70-75,000 IDPs and then to 143,354 IDPs as of March 2003). Many Moslem and Christian villages were totally destroyed, and many houses, Churches, and Mosques were burned down during the conflict. The situation was further aggravated by the reportedly arrival of the so-called "outsiders" - members of a militant Moslem group "Laskar Jihad" in late 2001. Entire villages were razed and the communities were divided deeply along religious lines. In August 2002, a relatively small incident caused the burning of Mattako village prompting IDPs to postpone the decision to return to their places of origin." (Bakornas & OCHA March 2003, p. 1)

"With each new wave of violence, residents fled to areas where members of their religion made up the majority: Muslims went to Palu, Poso town, and the coastal town of Parigi, while Christians fled to Tentena and Napu in the mountains, or Manado in North Sulawesi. As of January 2002, just after the Malino Declaration was signed, the government's office for coordinating humanitarian response to the conflict estimated a total of 86,000 displaced persons in Central Sulawesi. The Central Sulawesi Christian Church estimated 42,000 displaced persons in Christian areas of the province. If these estimates are accurate, there were roughly even numbers of displaced people from both groups." (HRW 4 December 2002, p. 39)

Displacement from Central and West Kalimantan

Ethnic tensions trigger displacement within West Kalimantan and to East Java (February 2002)

"Tensions between Dayaks and Madurese have occasionally erupted into violence. In 1999, Dayak attacks on Madurese in West Kalimantan resulted in the displacement of at least 60,000 Madurese to the provincial capital of Pontianak. The influx to Pontianak increased tensions in the area, and under pressure from Dayak and Malay communities, the GOI began resettling the Madurese IDP population to outlying areas of the province during 2001. In early 2001, Dayak attacks in Central Kalimantan caused several hundred deaths and the flight of more than 80,000 Madurese to Madura Island and other parts of Java." (USAID 26 February 2002)

PHYSICAL SECURITY & FREEDOM OF MOVEMENT

General

WFP survey shows security situation particularly alarming in Aceh (June 2002)

- Overall 17% of IDPs surveyed generally feel unsafe at their IDP site.
- Most insecure places are Pontianak Urban district, Kupanf Rural, Aceh Utara, Aceh Tengah and Aceh Barat.
- In five districts – Deli Serdang, and four districts surveyed in Aceh Province – IDPs report high rates of insecurity for women, ranging between 64% of all households in Deli Serdang to 100% in Aceh Barat.
- Socio-economic variables reveals little difference between IDPs from male- or female-headed households, or for Christian versus Muslim households
- By ethnicity, a substantially higher percentage of ethnically Acehnese IDPs report lack of safety and security, with 73.3% for women and 70.7% overall, indicative of the general security situation in Aceh province.
- Data shows that the longer the duration of displacement, the more secure the IDPs perceive their environment to be.
- By living situation, a higher percentage of households in camps report that they feel unsafe, particularly for women.

"District Level Analysis

Two variables from the survey are used to characterize safety and security among IDPs: general feelings of safety at the IDP site or camp, and perceptions of safety for women walking in the vicinity of the site after dark.

Overall, 17% of IDP households sampled report that family members feel generally unsafe at their IDP site. Figure 38 shows the percentage of households for each district whose members do not feel safe. Of the 50 districts in the sample, there are 10 (20%) in which none of the respondents indicate a lack of personal safety. In one-quarter of all districts, fewer than 5% of all households indicate feelings of insecurity. In 35% of all districts, between 10% and 36% of respondents feel unsafe. There is a notable increase in feelings of insecurity beginning with Pontianak Urban district, where 49% of households indicate general feelings of insecurity. Kupang Rural also exhibits moderate-high levels of perceived insecurity, with 51% of households, respectively, reporting that they do not feel safe. In three districts, the security situation is particularly alarming. In Aceh Utara, 98% of households report lack of safety, and in Aceh Tengah and Aceh Barat, 100% of respondents indicate feelings of insecurity.

Five district groups emerge to characterize IDPs' perceptions of women's safety after dark. The first group comprises one-third of all districts (or 16 of 50), in which 10% or less of all households indicate that women feel unsafe walking in the surrounding area at night (Figure 39). There is a slight break after Ambon district; between Bone and Aceh Timur, 15% to 33% of households report that women feel unsafe, comprising 27% of all districts. A third group of districts report moderate levels of insecurity for women, ranging between 41% of households in Pontianak Urban and 52% of households in Lombok Timur. In five districts – Deli Serdang, and four districts surveyed in Aceh Province – IDPs report high rates of insecurity for women, ranging between 64% of all households in Deli Serdang to 100% in Aceh Barat. Additionally, nine districts (not depicted in the figure) do not report any feelings of insecurity among women. Overall, 22% of household respondents indicate that women feel unsafe after dark.

As Figure 40 shows, 18 of the 50 districts (36%) have a cumulative index less than 10%, indicating that the sum of the percentage of households indicating lack of general safety for IDPs overall and for women is less than 10%. There are six districts in the sample where none of the household respondents indicate feelings of general insecurity or lack of safety for women – Alor, Banggai, Jember, Kampar, Kendari Urban, and Makassar. Nearly half of all districts (or 24 of 50) have a cumulative percentage ranging between 10% and 55%. There is a distinct cluster of districts with moderate-high cumulative insecurity percentages, comprising five districts between Indragiri Hulu with a cumulative percentage of 71% and Kupang Rural with 92%.

Three districts in Aceh Province –Aceh Timur, Aceh Utara, and Aceh Barat – have markedly high cumulative indices, ranging between 1.6 and 2. In these four districts, both general insecurity among IDPs and lack of safety for women contribute nearly equally to overall lack of personal safety. Similarly, in Kupang Rural and Pontianak Urban districts, with cumulative indices of 0.9 and 0.92, respectively, both indicators play a nearly equal role in feelings of insecurity among households.

Socio-Economic Analysis

Examining the indicators of personal security by the key socio-economic variables reveals little difference between IDPs from male- or female-headed households, or for Christian versus Muslim households. For elderly households, while the data do not suggest any significant differences in safety for women, they do indicate that IDPs from elderly households do feel less secure generally: 21% of elderly households report that they do not feel secure, compared with 15% of IDPs from non-elderly households ($p=.00$).

By ethnicity, a substantially higher percentage of ethnically Acehnese IDPs report lack of safety and security, with 73.3% for women and 70.7% overall, indicative of the general security situation in Aceh province. IDPs of the Poso/Pamona ethnic report the second highest rates of insecurity among IDPs overall, with 35.9% of women and 50.8% of households generally. The lowest report rates of insecurity are for IDPs of the Bima and Butonese ethnic groups. For IDPs of Papuan and Sasak (Lombok) ethnicity, none of the sampled households report a lack of general security; however, 21.9% and 19.0% of households from these districts, respectively, report that women do not feel safe at night.

The data support large differences among IDPs based on duration of displacement and living situation, and these differences are statistically significant. Table 16 shows that a higher percentage of IDPs displaced for 9 months or less report a lack of personal security: 39.4% of households report that women do not feel safe walking at night, and 20.1% of households report general lack of safety or security. In contrast, 18.8% of households displaced between 10-18 months report that women do not feel safe, followed by 14.4% of households displaced longer than 18 months. Similarly, general lack of security decreases from 20.1%, to 13.2% for IDPs displaced between 10 and 18 months, and 14.5% for households displaced longer than 18 months.

By living situation, a higher percentage of households in camps report that they feel unsafe, particularly for women. Thirty-six percent of women in camps with land access and 24.2% of women in camps without access to land do not feel safe walking in the area after dark. Conversely, a lower percentage of women living outside of camps with land access (11.8%) and without land (7.9%) feel insecure." (WFP Livelihood Survey: Synthesis Report June 2002, pp. 63-66)

Ambon district

"Nearly all families in Ambon always feel safe at their IDP site, reported by 344 households (89%). However, 26 households (7%) state that they never feel safe, and 16 respondents (4%) feel safe only rarely. An additional 47 IDP families (12%) feel generally safe in their IDP site. Reportedly, 40 women (10%) do not feel safe walking in the surrounding area at night, primarily because they are afraid or perceive the area to be unsafe. In 12 cases (30%), local authorities mandate that women are not free to walk about the camp site after dark." (WFP "Ambon district" June 2002, p. 22)

Maluku Tenggara district

"Almost all IDP families in Maluku Tenggara always feel safe at their IDP site, reported by 123 households (98%), while two households (2%) indicate that they generally feel safe, and one family (1%) reports that they never feel safe in their current living situation.

Most households report that women feel safe walking in the surrounding area at night. Women from five households (4%) do not feel comfortable leaving the household after dark, because they are afraid or perceive that the area is unsafe." (WFP "Maluku Tenggara" June 2002, pp. 23-24)

"The majority of families in Buru always feel safe at their IDP site, reported by 67 (71%) households. Twenty-six households (28%) indicate that they sometimes feel safe. However, only one family reports that they rarely feel safe.

A high percentage of women feel safe walking in the surrounding area at night, as reported by 74 households, or 79% of the sample." (WFP "Bur district" June 2002, p. 20)

Bone district

"Most families in Bone feel very safe at their IDP site, reported by 78 (84%) households. However, five households (5%) state that they do not feel safe. Ten households (10%) were unsure about their feeling of safety. Fourteen IDP households (15%) report that the surrounding area is not safe for women walking at night, primarily because they are afraid or perceive the area to be unsafe." (WFP "Bone district" June 2002, p. 19)

Kendari (rural) district

"A majority of IDP families (42 or 93%) residing in Kendari (Rural) always feel safe at the IDP site, while three households (7%) reported sometimes feeling safe living within Kendari (Rural). About 80% of respondents (36) report that women are safe to walk around the camp site at night. For the nine households (20%) that reported that women were not safe at night, all suggested that the reason was because they were afraid." (WFP "Kendari (rural)" June 2002, p. 19)

Muna district

"Three-quarters of the IDP households in Muna (31 or 72%) always feel safe at the IDP site. In addition, seven households (16%) indicate that they generally feel safe. However, one family reports that they never feel safe in their current living situation and four (9%) respondents rarely feel safe. It was also reported by 79% (34 households) that women were safe to walk around at night. For those who claimed it was unsafe, their main reasons were that women were afraid (three households or 33%), that it was unsafe (three households or 33%), and that it was not allowed by authorities (one household or 11%)." (WFP "Muna district" June 2002, pp. 19-20)

Kolaka district

"A total of 42 families (93%) in Kolaka always feel safe at the IDP site. Three households indicate that they generally feel safe. A majority of household heads report feeling very safe in Kolaka (38 or 87%); six household heads (13%) report not knowing whether or not they feel safe.

Women are reported by all households to be safe walking around the camp at night." (WFP "Kolaka district" June 2002, p. 19)

Buton district

"Nearly all families in Buton always feel safe at their IDP site, reported by 216 households (95%). Only eight households (4%) state that they never feel safe, two respondents feel safe only rarely, and two IDPs feel safe sometimes. Reportedly, women in seven households (3%) do not feel safe walking in the surrounding area at night, primarily because they are afraid or perceive the area to be unsafe." (WFP "Buton district" June 2002, p. 22)

Physical security (North Maluku)

WFP survey shows that 11% and 20% of IDPs surveyed in Maluku Utara and Halmahera district never feel safe at their IDP site (June 2002)

- 20% of IDPs surveyed in Halmahera district never feel safe at their IDP site.
- 14% of IDPs surveyed in Maluku Utara district never feel safe at their IDP site.
- 96% of IDPs surveyed in Ternate district always feel safe at their IDP site.
- 94% of IDPs surveyed in Bitung district always feel safe at their IDP site.
- 11% of IDPs surveyed in Manado district don't feel safe at their IDP site.
- 98% of IDPs surveyed in Minhasa district always feel safe at their IDP site.
- 97% of IDPs surveyed in Makassar district generally feel safe at their IDP site.
- 97% of IDPs surveyed in Ujung Padang district generally feel safe at their IDP site.
- 98% of IDPs surveyed in Sorong district generally feel safe at their IDP site.
- 99% of IDPs surveyed in Manokwari district generally feel safe at their IDP site.

Halmahera Tengah district

"Three-quarters of families (60) in Halmahera Tengah feel safe at their IDP site. A total of 16 households (20%), however, report that they never feel safe, two perceive that they are generally safe, and two rarely feel safe in their current location. All households, however, report that it is safe for women to walk around their local environment at night." (WFP "Halmahera Tengah district" June 2002, p. 16)

Maluku Utara district

"The majority of families in Maluku Utara always feel safe at their IDP site, reported by 112 (61%) households. One-quarter of all families (45 households) indicate that they generally feel safe. However, 26 (14%) families report that they never feel safe in their current living situation, and two (3%) respondents rarely feel safe. Of the 28 IDPs that express concern about personal safety, 26 (93%) live in camps.

A high percentage of women do not feel safe walking in the surrounding area at night, as reported by 77 households, or 42% of the sample. Half of these women (from 39 households) indicate that they are afraid outside of the household area after dark, while an additional 31% (24 households) of women report that the authorities restrict their movement after dark." (WFP "Maluku Utara district" June 2002, p. 21)

Ternate district

"Nearly all families in Ternate feel very safe at their IDP site, reported by 227 households (96%). However, two families rarely feel safe, and three families state that they never feel safe. (WFP "Ternate district" June 2002, p. 19)

Bitung district

"A majority of IDP families (127 or 94%) in Bitung always feel safe at the IDP site; five of all households indicate that they generally feel safe. However, three families report that they never feel safe in their current living situation. Additionally, 134 households (99%) report that women are safe to walk around the camp at night." (WFP "Bitung district" June 2002, p. 19)

Manado district

"Within the sample of 135 households, 103 families (76%) in Manado always feel safe at their IDP site. However, six families (4%) report that they never feel safe in their current living situation and nine respondents (7%) rarely feel safe. When asked about the intensity of feelings of safety, 116 households (86%) report that they feel very safe. However, 17 households (13%) report that they do not feel safe and two households claim that they do not know whether or not they feel safe. Although the sample size is too small to allow for chi-square comparisons, the findings suggest that a household is more likely to feel safe if they are living in a camp environment, in terms of both intensity and frequency ($p=.00$ for intensity and $p=.02$ for frequency)." (WFP "Manado district" June 2002, p. 19)

Minahasa district

"A majority of families (88 or 98%) in Minahasa always feel safe at the IDP site. However, one family reports that they never feel safe in their current living situation and one respondent rarely feels safe. Interestingly, when asked to rate the intensity of their feelings of safety, all households in this sample report that they feel very safe. Women from four households are afraid to walk in the surrounding area at night." (WFP "Minahasa district" June 2002, p. 20)

Makassar district

"Most families in Makassar always feel safe at their IDP site, reported by 26 (81%) households. Five (16%) households indicate that they generally feel safe, and one (3%) respondent never feels safe. All IDP households report that women feel safe walking in the surrounding area at night." (WFP "Makassar district" June 2002, p. 20)

Ujung Pandang district

"Most families in Ujung Pandang always feel safe at their IDP site, reported by 26 (81%) households. Five (16%) households indicate that they generally feel safe, and one (3%) respondent never feels safe. All IDP households report that women feel safe walking in the surrounding area at night." (WFP "Ujung Pandang" June 2002, p. 20)

Sorong district

"Nearly all families in Sorong feel generally safe at their IDP site, reported by 88 households (98%) – 87 families state that they always feel safe in their living situation, and one household feels safe "sometimes". The remaining two households feel safe "rarely" or "never", respectively. Both of these households are situated in camps. All 90 households state that women are safe to walk around the camp freely at night." (WFP "Sorong district" June 2002, pp. 19-20)

Manokwari

"Nearly all families in Manokwari feel safe at their IDP site, reported by 89 (99%) households – one family states that they never feel safe. Reportedly, 24 (27%) women do not feel safe to walk around their local area at night, primarily because they are afraid (22 or 92%)." (WFP "Manokwari district" June 2002, p. 16)

Physical security (Aceh)

Civilians in Aceh subjected to violence and extrajudicial executions during military operation (April 2004)

- Provincial police records show that between May and September 2003, 319 civilians have been killed, 117 civilians have been injured, and 108 civilians have disappeared.
- Real figures could be higher given the lack of monitoring and fear of retaliation.
- According to TNI data announced by military spokesman Colonel Ditya Sudharsono, from May 19 to September 5, 816 GAM members have been killed, 607 have been arrested and 466 have surrendered.
- Newspaper and NGO reports have detailed numerous extra-judicial executions of civilians by the Indonesian military (TNI) in the first week of hostilities.
- IDPs arrested at the end of May by the police for alleged links with the rebels. Their safety and whereabouts are unknown.

"Human Rights Watch has documented widespread human rights violations in Aceh province since the start of the military operations in the province in May 2003. Based on testimony from Acehnese refugees in Malaysia there is substantial evidence documenting the role of Indonesian security forces in extra-judicial executions, forced disappearances, beatings, arbitrary arrests and detentions, and drastic limits on freedom of movement in Aceh. There is also a clear pattern of security forces singling out and persecuting young men, who the military claim to be members or supporters of GAM.

The renewed fighting has also caused massive internal displacement. Thousands of civilians have fled their homes and been forcibly relocated by the military for operational reasons. The military has used heavy artillery to attack rebel bases, causing more displacement of nearby villages as thousands flee their homes.

The influx of troops has been accompanied by new and revived military tactics that are directly affecting civilians' daily lives. The stepped-up operations include patrols and "sweepings"—a set of tactics to identify separatists or their supporters through vehicle searches and document checks, moving systematically from one village to the next. In many incidents described to Human Rights Watch, security forces beat and abusively interrogated local residents. Other tactics under martial law include forcing villagers into compulsory night guard duty, and establishing a military presence at the village level, primarily through temporary posts manned by troops from outside Aceh. In all of these tactics young men are being singled out for harassment and abuse.

As of September 4, 2003, a military spokesman reported that at least 319 civilians had been killed since the start of martial law. In December 2003 a police spokesman put this figure at nearer 500." (HRW April 2004, pp. 4-5)

"On September 5, Polda (the Aceh provincial police) published a dossier on 544 civilians who have become victims of violence in Aceh since martial law was declared on May 19 until September 3, 2003. [The dossier showed that] 319 civilians have been killed, 117 civilians have been injured, and 108 civilians have disappeared.

According to KontraS Aceh's own dossier, from May 19 to August 18, 2003, 329 civilians have been killed (summary killings/executions), 315 civilians have been tortured/ill-treated, there have been 213 cases of arbitrary arrests/detention, and 78 cases of forced disappearances. KontraS Aceh's document also indicates that most of these civilians were targeted during searches by the military and police for guerrillas.

KontraS Aceh believes the real number of civilian victims is much higher, but the military is preventing NGOs from carrying out their monitoring work, and villagers are reluctant to report any violations they have suffered because there is no guarantee for the protection of victims and witnesses. Therefore, villagers have been willing to keep silent as long as their safety will be guaranteed, even though they have faced many military brutalities.

According to TNI data announced by military spokesman Colonel Ditya Sudharsono, from May 19 to September 5, 816 GAM members have been killed, 607 have been arrested and 466 have surrendered. Although a plan to set up a prison on Aceh's Pulau Nasi has been cancelled, hundreds of suspected GAM members have been transferred to one of the major prisons in Banda Aceh city, where they are being unlawfully held." (Laksamana.net 2 October 2003)

"Newspaper and NGO reports have detailed numerous extra-judicial executions of civilians by the Indonesian military (TNI) in the first week of hostilities. The most widely reported took place on May 21, when Indonesian soldiers reportedly dragged a group of men and boys out of their hut in the village of Mapa Mamplam. According to eyewitnesses, the soldiers lined the victims up and shot each one dead, execution style. Among those killed were three boys, aged eleven, thirteen, and fourteen.

The TNI immediately rejected these reports and set up a team composed of two soldiers and two Indonesian journalists to verify the allegations. After this investigation, the military claimed that all the villagers, including the three boys, were GAM spies. Even if true, it would not of course justify the summary execution of the villagers.

The TNI was also reportedly responsible for the summary execution of ten civilians in Bieureun district, two in Pata Mamplam, two in Pulo Raboe, and six in Cot Raboe, including two twelve-year old boys.

In separate media reports villagers told reporters that on May 25, 2003 government troops had killed three civilians in Peusangan and one civilian in Bukit Sudan. On May 23 and 24, five men were reportedly shot and killed by Indonesian soldiers in the village of Seunade." (HRW 5 June 2003, p. 2)

"On 24 May, twelve students and one alumini from IAIN Ar-Raniry University in Banda Aceh, the capital of Nanggroe Aceh Darussalam (NAD) Province were arrested, together with four internally displaced persons (IDPs). There is grave concern for their safety as their whereabouts are unknown.

The students and IDPs were arrested by members of the Police Mobile Brigade (Brimob) during a two hour raid on a student activities centre in the early hours of the morning. The military had accused the students of belonging to the pro-independence armed opposition group, the Free Aceh Movement (GAM). Other students however, have denied this claim and have stated that three of the students were volunteers with the Indonesian Red Cross, whilst five were activists in an environmental group.

According to media, witnesses have reported that the Brimob assaulted students during the raid. A reporter with the British newspaper, the Guardian, who visited the student facility the following day, stated that it had been vandalised.

The arrests follow the declaration by the government of Indonesia of a "military emergency" on 19 May and renewed military operations against GAM. The resulting security situation means that human rights defenders, including lawyers, are unable to carry out their work, which includes locating and visiting detainees. In this context the risk of torture and other human rights violations to anyone held in military or police detention, which was already commonplace, is greatly heightened." (AI 28 May 2003)

National Human Rights Commission pledges support for war while denouncing human rights violations (October 2003)

- Komnas HAM has pledged its support to the ongoing conflict in Aceh.
- In July Komnas HAM's monitoring team for war in Aceh said it had evidence of mass graves and other rights abuse cases.
- Komnas HAM directly accused the armed forces of extra-judicial killing.

"In an apparent attempt to bury the hatchet with the Indonesian Military (TNI), the National Commission on Human Rights (Komnas HAM) has pledged its support to the ongoing conflict in Aceh.

Komnas HAM members Achmad Ali and Taheri Noer met with hundreds of soldiers at the Blang Rancang military post in Syamtalira Aron regency on Sunday to give them a primer on human rights regulations.

"Komnas HAM is not a monster to the TNI and nor is the TNI to us. You (the soldiers) should not think human rights is a nightmare anymore. The emergency law stipulated here gives many exceptions to laws which protect basic rights.

"You are doing a noble job here, where your life is at stake. Human rights violations are natural under such conditions, but the issue is whether there can be legal sanctions given to the perpetrators," Achmad Ali told the soldiers.

"The plenary meeting of Komnas HAM, which is the only decision-making institution, has never called for an end to the military operation in Aceh. Just do your job. If you don't shoot or bomb, you are not soldiers, just a joke," said Achmad Ali.

The grudge between the TNI and Komnas HAM started when the latter conducted investigations into possible rights violations by the military and police in East Timor in 1999, the bloodshed in Tanjung Priok, East Jakarta, in 1984, and the shootings of students in 1998 and 1999 in Jakarta.

The latest quarrel occurred when Komnas HAM's monitoring team for war in Aceh, led by M.M. Billah, said it had evidence of mass graves and other rights abuse cases. There was yet a further investigation into the accusation.

In a press conference, Achmad Ali admitted that the team's three-day visit to the province was part of efforts to show them that "the commission is not an enemy of the TNI" and reduce possible rights violations during the military operation. " (The Jakarta Post 12 August 2003)

Following a mission to Aceh, Komnas HAM accuses the military of extra-judicial killings

"Indonesia's national human rights commission said Friday the military operation launched in Aceh province to preserve the country's unity in fact threatens to tear it apart.

Komnas HAM said the war begun six weeks ago to crush separatist rebels appears to be failing to win the hearts of the Acehnese people.

For the first time during the current operation Komnas HAM directly accused the armed forces of extra-judicial killing.

Reading from a statement, rights commissioner M.M. Billah said restrictions on journalists, non-governmental workers and rights activists isolate the province and threaten its peace, prosperity and democratic development.

Billah recently returned from his second trip to Aceh as part of a Komnas HAM team monitoring the rights situation during the military operation.

After his first visit Komnas HAM reported "strong indications" that seven people including two boys aged 12 and 13 were killed extra-judicially.

Billah said his team received additional testimony confirming that one victim was an elementary school student.

"It was done by the (armed forces) TNI," he said. Billah said Acehnese are subject to discriminatory practices that, since the start of the operation, have required them to obtain special identity cards in the red-and-white Indonesian colours.

Civil servants have also been required to undergo tests of loyalty to the nation and Acehnese in Jakarta have been subject to monitoring, he said.

He cited the development of civilian militias and the forced removal of villagers as additional factors contributing to tensions and internal conflicts among the population.

"In short, the Indonesian Armed Forces operation, it turns out, has a counter-productive boomerang effect for maintaining the nation's unity," Billah said.

Soldiers in Aceh say they have been sent there to help the people and minimize victims among non-combatants but Billah said troops in the field cannot always do this.

"That is evident in a qualitative way from the increasingly intense violations of human rights and humanitarian law in the field," he said.

"The military operation can be said to be leaning toward failing to reach its goal of 'fighting for the hearts of the Aceh people' and 'minimizing victims,'" he said.

Indonesia says its operation is not just a military offensive but an "integrated operation" including humanitarian assistance, law enforcement and the restoration of local administration.

The military strongly denied that they had killed civilians, saying the victims were GAM members shot as they fled. No weapons were recovered but rebels typically hide their weapons as they flee, the military said. Earlier this week Billah told AFP that witnesses told his team about three "abnormal" graves in North Aceh.

He said Friday that witnesses reported the graves appeared during the current operation but it remains unclear who did the killings.

Residents in Bireuen district have also reported what they called a mass grave and Komnas HAM will further investigate their reports when the team returns to Aceh next week, Billah said." (AFP 4 July 2003)

1,000 women displaced from Aceh reportedly forced into sex slavery (September 2003)

- Media report that 1,000 female Acehnese IDPs, who fled to neighboring North Sumatra from Aceh, have been forced to become sex workers.
- Representative of IDP women blamed their fate on the lack of assistance from the government.

"At least 1,000 female Acehnese refugees, who fled to neighboring North Sumatra because of war in their homeland, have been forced to become sex workers but the police are doing nothing about it, activists say.

The women, allegedly being trafficked as prostitutes, are generally aged between 16 and 26, they added.

Ikhwaluddin Simatupang, who leads the Advocacy Forum for Acehnese Refugees, said the discovery came about after investigating a number of complaints by parents who reported their daughters had been forced to serve as sex workers.

They are part of some 12,000 refugees from the war-torn province of Aceh, who have been languishing in camps across North Sumatra.

"Many of them are trafficked to Riau, while in North Sumatra, the sex workers from Aceh are mostly found operating in cities like Medan, Langkat and Asahan," Ikhwaluddin told The Jakarta Post on Saturday.

He blamed the economic factor as one reason that the Acehnese refugees were easily trapped by commercial sex syndicates.

"How could they avert such a trap, while they don't have anything to survive on. Up to now, the government has yet to fulfill its promise of giving the refugees Rp 8,750,000 (US$1,029) per family in assistance," he said.

Arifany, coordinator of non-governmental organization Pusaka Indonesia, confirmed the trafficking involving Acehnese girls." (The Jakarta Post 23 September 2003)

Kampar district

"Most families (43 or 96%) in Kampar always feel safe at the IDP site. However, one family reports that they never feel safe in their current living situation. When asked about the intensity of their feelings of safety, all households in this sample report that they feel very safe.

Of the four households living in a camp situation, all report that they are unrestricted in their movements and are able to move freely outside of the camp and outside of the village." (WFP "Kampar district" June 2002, p. 19)

Indragiri Hulu district

"Thirty-two IDP households (71%) report that they feel very safe in their location. Ten households are not sure whether they feel safe and three do not feel safe. Nineteen families (42%) report that it is not safe for

Freedom of movement (Aceh)

Checkpoints hamper movements of civilians out of Aceh (2004)

- Check-points established by the military to monitor the border between Aceh and North Sumatra are creating difficulties for people wishing to flee the conflict-affected province

"Elsewhere in Indonesia, Acehnese have also found themselves the target of new forms of government surveillance and control. For example, the Indonesian military has established checkpoints to monitor the internal border between Aceh and North Sumatra. Such checkpoints, where travel documents and the new national identity card are required for inspection, create considerable difficulties for those seeking to leave war-torn Aceh for North Sumatra. There are also reports of a wider climate of fear and intimidation for the many thousands of Acehnese currently living in North Sumatra as IDPs. The Indonesian security forces have reportedly been keen to monitor Acehnese communities in many parts of the country, and the police have been particularly active in conducting regular 'sweep operations' in the capital city of Jakarta." (Eva-Lotta Hedman January 2004)

"Reports that the border between North Sumatra province and Aceh is sealed suggest that new IDPs have not been able to seek refuge in North Sumatra since the military campaign began." (HRW September 2003)

"Movements to flee conflict have also been inhibited. Several layers of checkpoints have been established on the internal border between Aceh and North Sumatra where those seeking refuge in the neighbouring province are required to submit travel documents and their identity cards." (ICVA 5 September 2003)

The majority of households (99%) report that they feel very safe at their IDP site, while one respondent reports that they do not know whether they feel safe or not. Similarly, 99% of IDPs always feel safe, while one feels safe sometimes. However, a total of 25 households (28%) report that

The majority of households (70%) report that they feel very safe at their IDP site. Most (64%) always feel safe, and 27% sometimes feel safe. However, 20% of households report they do not feel safe in their IDP site, and 9% of households report they rarely or never feel safe. Pontianak (rural) district

"Over three-quarters of all families in Rural Pontianak always feel safe at their IDP site, as reported by 109 households (81%). "Most families in Bengkayang always feel safe at their IDP site, reported by 75 (83%) households. Fifteen (17%) households report that they sometimes feel safe. surrounding area at night, with the one exception reporting feeling afraid to do so." (WFP "Bima district" June 2002, p. 19)

Madurese IDPs evacuated from Pontianak for security reasons (July 2001)

- Fearing renewed violence if the Madurese IDPs were to stay in Pontianak, the government has planned to resettle them on the nearby islands of Padang Tikar and Tembang Kacang, despite opposition from the IDPs themselves, not wanting to risk losing their land and belongings, and also from some Indonesian officials.
- By the end of 1999, an unknown number of Madurese IDPs had been resettled to these islands, while others had returned to Madura even if the Madura authorities did not welcome them back.

"More than 1,000 ethnic Madurese refugees have been evacuated from camps on Borneo island, in the wake of violence that erupted in the region last month. Officials say on Saturday, as many as 198 refugee families were "quietly" moved out of camps in Pontianak, the capital of West Kalimantan province, to two new areas.

They say the refugees were moved for their own safety.

Officials have been trying to relocate almost 40-thousand refugees living in temporary shelters after violence against the refugees last month.

Angry Malay residents attacked and torched some of the centres on June 24 after a six-year-old boy died in an attempted robbery. The attack sparked other clashes between Madurese refugees and Malay and indigenous Dayak residents which left at least four people dead.

Leaders of the Dayak and Malay communities then called for the refugees to leave Pontianak by Sunday." (ABC 3 July 2001)

"Thousands of Madurese refugees in Indonesia's West Kalimantan province refused yesterday to leave their camps despite the threat of expulsion by two native ethnic groups, an official there said.

'The refugees have insisted that they stay in Pontianak,' said the official, at the mayor's office, referring to the provincial capital.

'The Government is negotiating with the refugees and Malays. We can't just force the Madurese to evacuate the camps; it's not right.'

Pontianak was calm, he said, after at least four Madurese, two of them settlers, were hacked to death on Monday in clashes between the Malays and the refugees. 'There are no more people in the streets carrying arms.'

Officials said on Tuesday that groups of youths from the indigenous Malay and Dayak communities had given the Madurese refugees a deadline to leave their Pontianak camps or face eviction.

Since Monday Pontianak officials have been trying to move 39,735 of the refugees living in four Pontianak sports complexes to new resettlement areas about 50 kilometres south of the city." (AFP 29 June 2001)

"The IDPs want to return to Sambas because they have lived there for years and have farms to go back to whereas they have nothing in Madura. But the local people of Sambas strongly refuse their return. If return is not possible (which does not look prospective at all at this moment) the IDPs demand the provincial government to pay a compensation for their properties of houses, lands, rice paddies, and cattle they left in Sambas. The issue of return or resettlement arrives at a deadlock" (U.S. 28 September 2000, "West Kalimantan", p. 2)

"Indonesia pledged funds to build resettlement communities on the nearby islands of Padang Tikar and Tembang Kacang. Some Indonesian officials objected to the plan, saying that separating the ethnic groups would flout Indonesia's motto of "unity in diversity." In addition, many of the displaced refused the resettlement offer, not wanting to risk losing their land and belongings at home. Fearing renewed violence if the Madurese stayed in Pontianak, the government said it would help them return to their native Madura. The Madura authorities, however, appeared not to want them back.

Despite the objections, by the end of the year the Indonesian government had relocated an unknown number of Madurese to nearby islands. A few thousand were believed to have returned to Madura, while others remained displaced on Borneo." (USCR June 2000)

SUBSISTENCE NEEDS

General subsistence needs of IDPs throughout Indonesia

IDP women particularly vulnerable to health risks (2004)

- Displacement make women particularly vulnerable to sexually transmitted diseases, HIV transmission as well as violence.

"The IDPs (and ex-IDPs in the resettlement areas) face a number of serious problems as they have left behind normal family and community support structures. In many cases they require immediate attention, not only in terms of food, water, and primary health care, but also Reproductive Health (RH). Such emergency situations put people in a vulnerable position, which increases the risk of Sexually Transmitted Disease (STD) and HIV transmission, unwanted pregnancy, complication of pregnancy and unsafe abortion, or even unsafe delivery that may lead to maternal death. In addition, the likely increase of violence against women (VAW) is of particular concern. With civil conflicts comes an absence of law and order, which puts women at increased risk of sexual and gender-based violence." (OCHA 9 April 2004, p. 60)

WFP survey shows that duration of displacement has an overall negative impact on health (June 2002)

"The health sector analysis uses three indicators to characterize the health status among IDPs: rates of household illness, rate of diarrhea among children under-five during the previous week, and the sole treatment of illnesses with either prayer or self-treatment. The rate of diarrhea among children under-five ranges from 0% to 87%. In all but three districts, the rate of diarrhea is less than 50%. In 32 of 50 districts, the incidence of diarrhea ranges from 11% (Minahasa) to 36% (Ternate). The rate of diarrhea among children in Belu is particularly high where 49% of children suffered from diarrhea during the previous seven days. In Aceh Tengah and Aceh Utara, 73% and 87% of children, respectively, suffered from diarrhea. The mean rate of diarrhea for IDP children overall is 23%.

Five categories of ailments were grouped and assigned rank values by their relative severity. Illness categories include major vector illnesses (dengue fever, malaria, and hepatitis), respiratory infections, gastrointestinal illnesses, skin infections, and minor illnesses. There are 11 districts with high major vector illness scores. Only two districts have a respiratory index score of 3.0 or greater, Belu and Kupang Rural. For dry season major vector illnesses, there are 5 districts with high major vector illness scores: Aceh Timur, Kupang Rural, Pontianak Urban, Kendari Urban, and Belu. The districts with the highest index for dry season respiratory illness include Kupang Rural, Belu, Pontianak Rural, Pontianak Urban, and Aceh Tengah.

Duration of displacement has an overall negative impact on health. Both wet and dry season illness rates are higher the longer households are displaced. The only exception to this general trend is the rate of diarrhea, which declines with longer duration of displacement." (WFP Livelihood Survey: Synthesis report June 2002, pp. vi-vii)

WFP survey shows IDPs from district of Langkat, Aceh Utara and Aceh Timur most affected by emotional trauma (June 2002)

- For 3/4 of all districts, the emotional index is less than 2 (on a total possible scale of 0 to 13), indicating relatively low levels of emotional trauma.
- Districts that have a much higher emotional index score: 3.7 in Langkat, 3.8 in Aceh Utara, and 4.4 in Aceh Timur.
- Districts that exhibit higher levels of emotional trauma among husbands include Maluku Utara, Belu, Kupang Urban, Langkat and Aceh Utara.
- Children most affected by emotional trauma are in Pontianak Urban (1.2), Aceh Utara (1.6) and Aceh Timur (2.1).
- Elderly households tend to experience slightly higher levels of emotional trauma.
- Levels of emotional trauma are highest among IDPs from the Batak, Poso/Papuan and Acehnese groups.
- For female respondents and children, levels of emotional trauma decrease slightly with a longer duration of displacement.
- Levels of emotional stress are higher in camp settings.

"Survey questions were designed in collaboration with an Indonesian social psychologist experienced with IDPs. Three sets of questions were established to determine levels of emotional trauma. The survey asks the female respondent from each household to indicate – by degree (“often”, “sometimes” or “never”) – the prevalence of a number of observable indicators for herself, her husband and her children. To present the findings on emotional health, an index has been created that combines all indicators of emotional stress for each respondent (women, men, and children). A score of 1 is attributed to each observable indicator for which the female respondent indicates “often.” Table 14 summarizes these indicators and shows the maximum possible index score. That is, if the female respondent reports that she has experienced all of the signs of emotional trauma since displacement “often”, she would have a total score of 13. Similarly, if she responds that her husband and children exhibit all of the listed indicators of emotional trauma, the maximum scores would be 16 and 12, respectively. For each district, the sum of “often” responses is used to produce a district mean, presented in the district level charts that follow.

District Level Analysis

Figure 33 shows that the score for female respondents ranges between 0 in Kendari Rural and 4.4, in Aceh Timur. A lower score indicates relatively lower levels of emotional trauma among women. Conversely, a high index score indicates a higher incidence of emotional trauma. For three-quarters of all districts, the emotional index is less than 2 (on a total possible scale of 0 to 13), indicating relatively low levels of emotional trauma. An additional 7 districts display slightly higher scores of emotional trauma, ranging between 2 in Tana Toraja and 2.6 in Bone. There is a group of three districts that have a much higher emotional index score: 3.7 in Langkat, 3.8 in Aceh Utara, and 4.4 in Aceh Timur.

For husbands of female respondents, over half (56%) have an emotional score ranging between 0 and 1.5 (Figure 34). Adult males in 11 districts (22%) have particularly low scores ranging between 0 in Kendari Urban and 0.34 in Maluku Tengah. Districts that exhibit higher levels of emotional trauma include Maluku Utara, Belu, Kupang Urban, Langkat and Aceh Utara,. For these districts, scores range between 2.6 in Maluku Utara and 3.1 in Aceh Utara. Males in the district of Aceh Timur have a notably higher level of emotional trauma score, with a score of 3.4.

For IDP children, the range of actual scores is between 0 and 2.1 (out of a total possible scale of 0-12). In six districts, female respondents do not report any indicators of emotional trauma for children “often.”

These districts include Aceh Barat, Indragiri Hulu, Jember, Kendari Urban, and Lombok. For 30 districts (60%), the score for children is 0.5 or less (Figure 35). Fourteen districts (ranging between Ternate and Kupang Urban in Figure 35) appear to have moderate levels of emotional trauma, with index scores ranging between 0.5 and 1. The figure shows a distinct break with the district of Pontianak Urban, where the emotional trauma score is 1.2, increasing to a score of 1.6 in Aceh Utara. Similar to findings for women and men, the levels of emotional trauma for children are highest in Aceh Timur district, with a score of 2.1.

Figure presents an overall index score for emotional trauma by district, combining scores for women, men, and children. The scale for the stacked chart ranges between 0 and 12. As the figure shows, for most districts, levels of emotional trauma are similar for men and women. Emotional trauma among children makes a slightly lower contribution to overall district scores. More than two-thirds of IDPs have a cumulative index less than 2, ranging between 0 and 2.3 in Kolaka. Levels of emotional trauma increase between Kupang Rural, with a score of 3.0, and Maluku Utara, with a stacked index score of 6.6. Three districts report particularly high levels emotional trauma overall: Langkat, with a score of 8.4; Aceh Utara, with a score of 8.7; and Aceh Timur, with the highest score of 11.0.

Socio-Economic Analysis

The table of socio-economic indicators indicates that elderly households tend to experience slightly higher levels of emotional trauma. The average cumulative emotional trauma index for female respondents from elderly households is 1.9, compared with an index of 1.5 for female respondents in households in which all working members are under 51 years of age ($p=.00$). For males from elderly households, the index of 1.8 is also slightly higher than the index score of 1.4 for men from nonelderly households (.00).

For ethnicity, female respondents of Sasak (Lombok) and Papuan ethnic groups report lower levels of emotional trauma for themselves, their husbands and children. Conversely, levels of emotional trauma are highest among IDPs from the Batak, Poso/Papuan and Acehnese groups. Disaggregating indicators of emotional trauma by religion does not suggest any substantial differences between Muslim and Christian IDPs.

The data do reveal slight significant differences among the categories of duration of displacement. For female respondents and children, levels of emotional trauma decrease slightly with a longer duration of displacement. Similarly, levels of emotional trauma among males displaced for less than 9 months is slightly higher than for those displaced for IDPs for longer periods of time.

In terms of living situation, the data show that for female respondents, their spouses and children, levels of emotional stress are higher in camp settings. For women and men, levels of emotional trauma are lowest for non-camp IDPs with access to land, indicating that living outside of a camp setting and having access to productive resources may contribute to higher levels of emotional security." (WFP Livelihood Survey: Synthesis report June 2002, pp. 56-62)

Food security of IDP households is generally poor (June 2002)

- Districts of Aceh Utara, Aceh Barat, Aceh Tengah, Lumajang, Halmahera Tengah, and Tana Toraja are the most food insecure.
- In 45 of 50 districts (90%), daily per capita caloric intake from staples is 50% or more of the daily minimum recommended level of 2,100 Kcal.

"Food Security

Generally, the food security situation of IDP households is poor. An unweighted cumulative z-score for food security ranks each district. The index shows the districts of Aceh Utara, Aceh Barat, Aceh Tengah, Lumajang, Halmahera Tengah, and Tana Toraja to be the most food insecure. A consolidated food insecurity index composed of four food insecurity proxy indices shows Tana Toraja's level of food insecurity is classified as extremely high. Food insecurity in four districts is classified as very high – Aceh Utara, Deli Serdang, Bone, and Kampar.

The average percentage of energy (Kcals) consumed from staple foods ranges between 25% in Tana Toraja to 81% in Kendari Rural. In 45 of 50 districts (90%), daily per capita caloric intake from staples is 50% or more of the daily minimum recommended level of 2,100 Kcal. Sixty percent of all districts (30 of 50) consume between 50% and 70%. In four districts, however, average daily consumption from staples is less than 50% of the recommended daily intake: Tana Toraja, Halmahera Tengah, Lumajang, and Bone.

Households in all but three districts – Aceh Barat, Aceh Tengah, and Alor – consume side dishes at least once per day, on average. About half of all districts consume side dishes at least twice per day, with Jember reporting the highest mean frequencies for daily side-dish consumption at nearly three times per day.

For IDPs overall, the average per capita food expenditure is 2,321 Rp/day. IDPs from three-quarters of the sample districts spend between 1,500 and 3,000 Rp/day on food, on average. IDPs in five districts spend on average less than 1,000 Rp/person/day on food, including Kupang Rural, Aceh Tengah, Jember, Sampang, and Aceh Timur. Female-headed households have a significantly higher mean per capita daily expenditure on food than male-headed households, although average per capita income is lower for female-headed households." (WFP June 2002, p. v)

- 18 districts (36%) have at least 10% of respondents indicating they do not have sufficient access to potable water.
- Aceh Barat (99%), Aceh Tengah (96%), Lumajang and Jember (60%) have the highest number of households without access to potable water.
- 41 districts (80%) have households indicating they do not have access to latrines, with a mean percentage of 36%
- Forty-five districts (88%) report they do not have access to trash bins (Figure 27), with a mean percentage of 59%
- Households that have the least access to all facilities indicated are Indragiri Hulu, Aceh Tengah, Malmahera Tengah, Maluku Tenggara and Sampang.
- Access to facilities, with the exception of potable water, increases significantly for households that have been displaced longer.
- For potable water, IDPs that have been displaced for a long duration report the greatest lack of potable water (6%)

"Access to facilities such as water and sanitation are important elements to healthy living and reflect the level of service available to households. Particularly important is access to latrines and potable water. Not only do the presence of these facilities make life easier for households, they also help prevent spread of diseases.

District-Level Analysis

IDP household respondents provided information on access to facilities. The indicators used for facilities are lack of sufficient potable water (with the exception of rainwater), latrines and trash bins.

Out of the 50 districts surveyed, 18 districts (36%) have at least 10% of respondents indicating they do not have sufficient access to potable water. As Figure 25 indicates, the district with the largest percentage of respondents indicating they do not have access to potable water is Aceh Barat with 99%. Households in this district primarily access rainwater for their drinking water needs.

Potable water is also not available for almost all of the respondents Aceh Tengah. Lumajang and Jember have about 60% without sufficient access. The majority of districts have less than 20% of respondents reporting inability to access sufficient potable water.

As Figure 26 shows, 41 districts (80%) have households indicating they do not have access to latrines. The mean percentage of individuals in these districts without latrines is 36% with a standard deviation of 34%. Of these 41 districts, 46% indicate over one-half of household respondents do not have latrines. All households surveyed in the districts of Indragiri Hulu and Aceh Tengah do not have access to latrines. Other districts include Halmahera Tengah (95%), Maluku Tenggara (90%), and Sampang (87%).

Forty-five districts (88%) report they do not have access to trash bins (Figure 27), with a mean percentage of 59%. Of these 45 districts, over half (25 or 56%) have over three-quarters of households indicating they lack trash bins. In the districts of Indragiri Hulu, Halmahera, and Bangkalan, no households surveyed have the ability to dispose of trash in bins. Districts with over 90% of households unable to access trash bins include Manokwari, Aceh Tengah, Maluku, Kupang Rural, Bima, Alor, and Kolaka.

Figure 28 provides a cumulative index of the three facilities indicators for each district. All households from the districts of Bitung and Aceh Barat have access to potable water, latrines and trash bins, however all other districts have households that lack some access to facilities. Households that have the least access to all facilities indicated are Indragiri Hulu, Aceh Tengah, Malmahera Tengah, Maluku Tenggara and Sampang. Of the three facility-type indicators, surveyed IDP households have lowest access to trash bins.

Socio-Economic Analysis

Access to latrines and trash bins does not vary between male and female-headed households (Table 12). Male-headed households, however, do have significantly less access to potable water, although only a small percentage (3.9%) do not have access. There is also no significant difference in access to facilities between elderly and non-elderly households.

Ethnic groups with the lowest access to latrines include Bima and Poso/Pamona (over half of the households do not have latrine access). Sasak and Madurese also have low access (where 49% and 44% do not have access, respectively). In contrast, latrines are highly accessible to Flores and Papuan groups.

Almost no Bima and Papuan households have access to trash bins. Access is less than 50% in all ethnic groups except Moluccan and Manadonese. Madurese have the lowest access to potable water (13.5% do not have access).

Access to facilities, with the exception of potable water, increases significantly for households that have been displaced longer. For households displaced less than 9 months, 63% do not have latrines access. This rate drops to 26% for households displaced over 18 months. Trash bin access also increases significantly. For households displaced less than 9 months, 77% do not have trash bin access. This rate drops to 52% for households displaced over 18 months. For potable water, IDPs that have been displaced for a long duration report the greatest lack of potable water (6%).

Non-camp households with access to land have the lowest latrine access (58% of households have no access) while camp households without land have the highest access (only 13% report no access). Non-camp households with and without access to land have the lowest access to trash bins. In these settings 83% and 74% respectively, report no access. Camp settings with access to land have the highest access. About 10% of households in settings where there is no access to land do not have potable water. IDPs that live in camps and have no land have the greatest lack of potable water (9%)." (WFP Livelihood Survey: Synthesis report June 2002, pp. 47-51)

WFP survey shows that IDPs primarily lack beds or mats, followed by a lack of blankets and clothing (June 2002)

- Districts with the highest number of respondents reporting inadequate amounts of clothing are Aceh Tengah (11%), Maluku Utara (9%), Deli Serdang (7%), and Minahasa (7%).
- Districts with notably high percentages of respondents lacking blankets include Lumajang (96%), Aceh Tengah (93%), and Sampang (86%).
- Districts primarily lack an appropriate number of beds or mats for all family members, followed by a lack of blankets and clothing.
- Districts with high percentages of households that do not have the basic non-food needs of clothes, beds or mats, and blankets include Aceh Tengah, Indragiri Hulu, Bangkalan, Pontianak Urban, Sampang, Bengkayang, Lumajang and Pontianak Rural.

"IDP household respondents provide information on their ability to obtain non-food needs. Three indicators were used to determine if households were able to access an adequate amount of clothes, beds or mats, and blankets for all family members.

District Level Analysis

Figure 29 shows that half of all districts (29 or 57%) report at least 1% of households are not able to obtain enough clothes for family members. However, the majority of these districts have less than 2% of respondents that indicate this is the case. The districts with the highest number of respondents reporting inadequate amounts of clothing are Aceh Tengah (11%), Maluku Utara (9%), Deli Serdang (7%), and Minahasa (7%).

All 50 districts report that at least 2% of households do not have enough beds or mats for family members. Four districts, Aceh Tengah, Indragiri Hulu, Aceh Utara and Aceh Barat, report that all households surveyed lack the appropriate number of beds or mats. A total of 33 districts (65%) have over 50% of respondents indicating this to be the case (Figure 30).

Figure 31 provides information on the districts that report there are not enough blankets for all family members. At least 1% of household respondents' report this is the case in 46 districts (90%), with the district of Indragiri Hulu indicating all households surveyed do not have enough blankets. For one-third of districts, over half of respondents in each district report a lack of blankets. Districts with notably high percentages include Lumajang (96%), Aceh Tengah (93%), and Sampang (86%).

Finally, Figure 32 provides a cumulative score of the three non-food need indicators for each district. Districts primarily lack an appropriate number of beds or mats for all family members, followed by a lack of blankets and clothing. The districts of Aceh Tengah and Indragiri Hulu have the largest percentage of households that do not have the basic non-food needs of clothes, beds or mats, and blankets. Districts with similarly high percentages include Bangkalan, Pontianak Urban, Sampang, Bengkayang, Lumajang and Pontianak Rural.

Socio-Economic Analysis

Non-food needs do not significantly vary according to gender of the household head (Table 13). Both male and female-headed households have adequate clothing, but the majority of households do not have an adequate number of blankets or beds and mats. Elderly households have slightly more members without adequate clothing, but the difference is not statistically significant. Rates of bed/mat and blanket availability also do not differ according to household age.

Non-food items do vary considerably among ethnic groups. In general, the Acehnese have more nonfood needs than other groups. More than 5% of Acehnese do not have adequate clothing (Table 13); nearly all households have members that do not have their own bed or mat and nearly 80% do not have blankets. Flores/Alor groups have the lowest non-food needs. Muslim households show slightly higher ownership of beds and mats but have significantly lower ownership of blankets (42.9% of household members do not have blankets compared to 18.2% for Christian households).

For households displaced more than nine months, non-food needs generally decline. More than 75% of households displaced nine months or less do not have adequate beds and mats and 59% do not have blankets. These figures decline significantly for households displaced longer, as shown in Table 13. Households with land access lack clothing at much higher rates than households without land, but their ownership of beds/mats and blankets varies." (WFP Livelihood Survey: Synthesis report June 2002, pp. 52-55)

Maluku Province (general)

Needs identified by an OCHA/Bakornas mission to Ambon Island and recommendations (April 2003)

- Data collection efforts should be strengthened to obtain reliable IDP figures.
- Complementary assistance should be provided in terms of housing assistance, water & sanitation and income generating activities.
- Facilitation of dialogue between IDP communities and the Governmental Units.
- Need for psychological support for the IDPs.

"Strengthening of data collection efforts: It seems that sometimes the number of IDPs provided by the Provincial Government does not match with the number provided by the IDP coordinators in camps/sites. More coordinated efforts in obtaining and verifying the number of IDPs seems necessary.

Complementary assistance to the Government's housing assistance. Often cases, the relocation sites do not have sufficient water/sanitation facilities. Though IDPs have been provided with houses, they tend to go back to IDP camps/sites. Further support in providing basic facilities and assistance for re-establishing their livelihood at return/resettlement sites is essential to make return and resettlement/relocation sustainable. The Government stressed the importance of income generation activities for returnees and resettled families.

Flexible Government's assistance to IDPs who manage to get other financial support to re-establish their lives at relocation sites: 164 families from Buru Island and Ambon city living in Halong Inn received financial support from a Dutch Christian organization and managed to secure land and start building houses. In this case, the Government's complementary support for water/sanitation facilities and roads/infrastructure would be ideal, as they did not receive housing assistance from the Government.

Prioritisation of sites when building houses: It is understood that the current priority is to build houses in Waai village to allow IDPs to return there as they received eviction order after the security incident at the IDP site in Nimba Raya Paso. However, there are some IDPs living in unacceptably congested sites that need to be relocated as soon as possible.

Facilitation of dialogue between IDP communities and the Governmental Units, especially POSKO and streamlining of information flow. Socialisation of options and entitlements is essential. Some IDPs complain that they filled checklists/forms for the Government many times, but received no response.

Provision of psychosocial support for IDPs: This was identified by the Government.

Recruitment of a Humanitarian Affairs Officer to provide technical assistance to the Maluku Provincial Government and to strengthen the existing capacity to respond to the needs of IDPs in finding durable solutions. The proposal was welcomed by Dr. Umarella." (Bakornas & OCHA April 2003, pp. 3-4)

Decline in health, education, sanitation standards calls for sustained assistance (February 2003)

- Decline in health, education and sanitation standards has longterm implications for children, in terms of growth stunting, opportunities for future employment, and untreated chronic health problems.
- Conflict has restricted transport and humanitarian access.

"Since the conflict erupted there has been a serious decline in health care and educational access and standards. Low levels of potable water and sanitation in many areas, reduced staff and disruptions to supply chains for medical supplies and school equipment add to health risks and have lowered educational outcomes for the Province and IDP influx areas. The decline in these standards has longterm implications for children, in terms of growth stunting, opportunities for future employment, and untreated chronic health problems.

The conflict has restricted transport and humanitarian access. Durable solutions will need to address improving access and logistic systems particularly to remote areas. Other priorities are the re-building of local health and education capacities, replacing food relief with livelihood support, shifting the emphasis to locally-determined and managed solutions and supporting re-bridging initiatives between the divided communities. Infrastructure replacement is key to supporting returns, ensuring livelihood support and returning the province to some degree of normality." (UNOCHA 14 February 2003, p. 16)

Health

Health care system in the Maluku devastated by two years of conflict (2004)

- Conflict in Maluku province in 1999 and 2000 greatly impacted on the health care system of the province resulting in sharp reduction in staff, disruption in the supply chain of medical commodities and inability to travel

"The conflict in Ambon during 1999 and 2000 devastated the health care system throughout Maluku Province. The capacity of the Health Department to implement basic primary health services was greatly reduced due to a reduction in staff caused by displacement, and a disruption in the Department's supply chain of pharmaceuticals and medical commodities. Staff movement, displacement, and the inability to travel due to unstable security also hampered the management structure of health services." (OCHA 9 April 2004, p. 88)

Shelter and non-food items

5,460 IDP families in Ambon told to vacate the public and government buildings by July 2004 (April 2004)

- 5,460 IDP families who have been occupying public buildings and facilities in Ambon since 1999 have until July 2004 to leave.
- Lack of funds and of shelters is reportedly preventing the return of the remaining IDPs in Ambon.

"The 5,460 families of refugees on the island of Ambon have been given until July 2004 to vacate the public and government facilities they have been camping in since 1999. "The refugees must leave these compounds in the next two months at the latest", Deputy Governor M. Abdullah Latuconsina said in Ambon on April 21 after visiting some camps. The refugees are staying at shop compounds in Batumerah, the athletes' dormitory in Karangpanjang, the Waihaong People's Entertainment Park and several government buildings. They are part of the 36,000 refugee families who are still in camps throughout the province, mainly due to lack of funds for transportation and rebuilding their homes." (CCDA 23 April 2004)

"At least 5,460 families of refugees who fled sectarian fighting in the Maluku islands have been given until July to vacate shops and government facilities they have been camping in since 1999.

'The refugees must leave these camps in the next two months at the latest,' Deputy Maluku Governor M. Abdullah Latuconsina said in Ambon on Wednesday after visiting the camps.

The refugees are staying at shop houses in Batumerah, the athlete dormitory in Karangpanjang, the Waihaong People's Entertainment Park and several government buildings.

They were among some 36,828 families who fled the religious fighting and are now in camps throughout the province.

Latuconsina said the July deadline was only effective for 5,469 families of refugees in downtown Ambon, who were staying in public facilities.

He said his administration could not set a deadline for other refugees to leave their camps because of a lack of funds to build them houses.

The Maluku government has allocated Rp 400 billion (US$45.6 million) to send home all the refugees but the money was only enough to build some 10,000 houses for them, Latuconsina said.

'We need more funds from the central government to build many more houses,' he said.

Refugees that still had houses were being offered Rp 10 million a family to return to their villages in order to resolve this problem." (The Jakarta Post 22 April 2004)

Vulnerable groups

A third of the 300,000 displaced in Maluku are children, assistance protection required (February 2003)

- An estimated 108,000 out of Maluku's 300,000 IDPs are children who face many challenges ranging from lack of educational support to health care shortages

"An estimated 108,000 out of Maluku's 300,000 IDPs are children. In some locations, the process of IDP return and reintegration has started, creating different challenges for post-conflict recovery. Overcrowded classrooms, the lack of active child-centered pedagogy, and shortages of essential supplies have reduced educational outcomes. The health care system faces critical shortages of trained staff, equipment and supplies. Children lack support for psychosocial recovery and opportunities to express their views. More vulnerable children also require protection against exploitation and harm." (UNOCHA 14 February 2003, p. 64)

North Maluku province (general)

IDPs in Bitung, North Sulawesi no longer in need of international assistance (June 2004)

- UN mission to North Sulawesi in June has concluded that most IDP no longer wanted to return to North Maluku.
- Also the mission stated that these IDPs had received more support than IDPs in other areas of the country.

"A joint OCHA/UNDP/UNICEF assessment mission to IDP locations in Bitung, North Sulawesi, concluded that the majority of the remaining IDPs no longer desired to return to North Maluku, and that the support they had received from the provincial government in many ways exceeded the support that IDPs received in other parts of the country. The mission recommended that priority be given to resolution of land ownership issues and economic development, but that the IDPs generally were not in need of international assistance." (OCHA 30 June 2004)

Situation in North Maluku has shifted from a humanitarian phase to a post-conflict recovery phase (2004)

- Local economies remain depressed, resulting in continued scarcity and high levels of unemployment.
- The provision of basic social services such as health, education, and water and sanitation, has been uneven across the province.
- Situation in North Maluku has shifted from a humanitarian phase to a post-conflict recovery phase.
- Emergency humanitarian operations were substantially reduced in 2001 and almost completely stopped in 2002 by both Government and international organisations.
- Aid workers have identified vulnerable groups in inadequate shelters and with poor health services that are seriously at risk of malnutrition, disease and lack of schooling

"Despite these notable positive developments, the situation remains fragile and specific vulnerabilities continue to exist. There has been some continuing tension, including angry demonstrations by IDPs in North Maluku, concerning the overall management of the return process and, in particular, the management of government assistance packages. The conflict has severely affected livelihoods of communities through displacement, damage to market areas, and loss of tools and supplies. Local economies remain depressed, resulting in continued scarcity and high levels of unemployment. The provision of basic social services such as health, education, and water and sanitation, has been uneven across the province. In remote areas, especially in the south, most services are not functioning, mainly due to lack of human and financial resources, equipment, and damaged or inadequate facilities.

While assistance to meet short-term needs should continue for some time, the situation in North Maluku has reached a stage where more emphasis is placed on efforts to enhance economic recovery, engage in longer-term capacity building and develop peace building strategies. Support for income generation, livelihood and economic activities is essential for ensuring longer-term sustainable development and preventing the re-emergence of conflict in the future. Such programmes should include support to peace building through education and the media, as well as access to justice and law enforcement. It is also important that protection needs and human rights of IDPs be met at all stages, including after their IDP status was removed at the end of 2003 as per the government policy on IDPs. Increased cooperation on the return of IDPs between the governments of North Sulawesi and North Maluku, agreement between IDPs and recipient communities, the development of linkages, and positive relationships between communities remain crucial for sustainable recovery and minimising the risk of conflict." (OCHA 9 April 2004, pp. 20-21)

"Most services are not yet fully functional and the pre-conflict economy is yet to recover. The results of unsanitary crowding, lack of services and inadequate food production will leave long-term community problems such as low education levels, loss of productive assets of the most vulnerable, and chronic health problems including untreated mental health conditions. In general, however, the situation in North Maluku has shifted from a humanitarian phase to a post-conflict recovery phase. Emergency humanitarian operations were substantially reduced in 2001 and almost completely stopped in 2002 by both Government and international organisations. The Government stood by its position last year not to provide any further assistance to IDPs so as to encourage returns.

Subsequently, aid workers have identified vulnerable groups in inadequate shelters and with poor health services that are seriously at risk of malnutrition, disease and lack of schooling. However, the emphasis for international organisations is now on supporting local Government and communities to facilitate return, on economic recovery and livelihood support and on longer-term capacity-building and peace-building strategies. These focuses will continue into 2003 but with particular attention to the rebuilding of the health and education sectors.

Note: In 2003 OCHA will withdraw its humanitarian co-ordinating function from the UN Resource Centre (UNRC) in North Maluku. Other UN agencies are expected to continue to operate from and manage the UNRC." (UNOCHA 14 February 2003, p. 19)

Water & sanitation

High needs for water & sanitation in North Maluku (2004)

- Lack of comprehensive water & sanitation intervention in southern areas of North Maluku where needs are reportedly high.

"There are demonstrated high needs in the southern areas of North Maluku in the water and sanitation sector. Aside from some government activities and some NGOs who will provide housing along with MCKs (Combined Bathing, Washing and Latrine Facilities), there is no large-scale comprehensive water and sanitation intervention in Gane Barat, Bacan and Obi.

Water and sanitation projects are among the highest on the communities' needs lists. Repeated requests by local communities and CARDI's partners show that needs exist as a result of high levels of destruction, lack of basic systems such as education or health care, loss of economic means, and dissipation of community cohesion. The already unsatisfying situation before the conflict has worsened. Most of the indicators for water supply are far below the SPHERE standards.

There is a high dependency on rainwater collection, which is hazardous during the dry season and causes health risks. Natural sources are often far from villages (frequently several kilometres), wells have been contaminated or destroyed during the conflict, and the demographic changes related to the conflict make some of the sources overused and dirty. Low water source coverage has had negative implications for the income of households that need to buy water. Coupled with ongoing housing programmes, which require water for construction, the strain on families has reduced time for productive activities or family care for women and children who spend hours collecting water.

As per sanitation, public latrines were destroyed in many villages, and few facilities exist as most of the population defecates in backyards. Non-existent or limited water and sanitation facilities have been cited by IDPs as a reason for postponing return." (OCHA 9 April 2004, p. 97)

Vulnerable groups

45,000 IDP children are still facing problems in education, health, and child protection (February 2003)

- An estimated 45,000 children are reportedly facing many problems in education, health and protection, although the gradual return and reintegration process is providing opportunities to meet these challenges

"While conflict has largely abated throughout the province, some 45,000 IDP children, as well as sizeable numbers of host-community children are still facing problems in education, health, and child protection. In many localities, however, the process of IDP return and reintegration has created opportunities for strengthening inter-communal bonds and overcoming the effects of religious segregation through formal and non-formal education and through psychosocial support for children." (UNOCHA 14 February 2003, p. 70)

Aceh (general)

Restricted access limits knowledge about the humanitarian needs of civilians, shortage of basic services reported (September 2003)

- The limited or inexistant access granted to UN and international NGOs hampers any independent assessment of the needs of the affected population.

- Fighting between the Indonesian military and GAM has disrupted the lives and livelihoods of civilians by cutting food supplies, water, electricity, communications, schooling, and healthcare to thousands.
- Over five hundred schools have been burned down.
- Overall picture from the scant information available is that the population of Aceh faces a shortage of basic supplies and services.
- Military assistance appears to be mainly concentrated in 'show camps,' which are on major routes accessible by journalists.
- Recent information on the conditions in one of the IDP camps suggests inadequate water supply and sanitation

"Since martial law began in Aceh, the Indonesian government has restricted U.N. agencies and international NGOs from carrying out their duties in the province. International humanitarian aid agencies have had no access at all to areas outside of Banda Aceh, causing concern that adequate humanitarian assistance is not reaching many of those in need. An independent assessment must be made of the needs of Aceh's civilians to determine their humanitarian needs and provide them with the necessary assistance. Given Indonesia's lack of capacity and experience in handling these types of problems, the role of international humanitarian actors is particularly important, and their forced absence more troubling.

Little is known about the well-being of Aceh's civilian population. Most of Aceh's 4.2 million residents live in relative isolation outside the province's two main towns. Fighting between the Indonesian military and GAM has disrupted the lives and livelihoods of civilians by cutting food supplies, water, electricity, communications, schooling, and healthcare to thousands. Food distribution networks have been disrupted by attacks on food convoys despite recent attempts by the Indonesian military to secure the main routes. Over five hundred schools have been burned down. Electricity pylons in several districts were sabotaged.

Telephone communications outside Banda Aceh have been severely disrupted. The overall picture from the scant information available is that the population of Aceh faces a shortage of basic supplies and services. Conditions are likely to be worse for those who have been forced to flee their homes. Preliminary information indicates that the fighting has forced thousands of civilians out of their homes. The Jesuit Refugee Service and Indonesian media sources have already highlighted reports of poor water and sanitation facilities, malnutrition, and skin complaints amongst this population." (HRW September 2003, pp. 4-5)

"The military structures have sought to prove their ability to cope with the humanitarian needs, but this military assistance appears to be mainly concentrated in 'show camps,' which are on major routes accessible by journalists. Recent information on the conditions in one of the IDP camps suggests inadequate water supply and sanitation. Shelter, where it has been provided, is in barrack-style buildings or large tents, offering no personal space or privacy to the occupants, and raising concern for the security of women and children. The health data on the IDPs being made available by the authorities in Banda Aceh is not exhaustive and is limited to those in camps. Data on food assistance, including reports from reliable local contacts, suggest that the provision of food is not adequate in terms of rations, is provided inconsistently, and does not reach all camps.

Though the government has referred to the relatively high rate of IDP return as a positive indication of an improving humanitarian situation, these IDPs not only remain vulnerable to future violence, but many have returned home to find their property and assets looted or destroyed, thereby inhibiting their ability to re-establish livelihoods following displacement. Those communities that have not been displaced find themselves unable to travel to their fields, markets, places of employment in plantations or factories, or to make use of the family social support networks they may have in other areas, thereby further reducing their capacity to cope with the effects of the conflict." (ICVA 5 September 2003, p. 2)

"Despite Rp.400 billion (some U.S.$48 million) allocated for the so-called humanitarian component of the Integrated Operation, including for camps to be prepared for people deliberately displaced to protect them from hostilities, the preparations have been woefully inadequate.

Local journalists have covered the plight of thousands of displaced in Bireun district who found themselves in a camp in Cot Gapu, Bireun, with inadequate drinking water and sanitation. When as many as 300 people per day were falling ill, medical services in the area could simply not respond to the need.

The story from North Aceh district is similar. On 30 June, villagers from Seumirah, Alue Papeun and Alue Dua in Nisam subdistrict were suddenly told to evacuate to Cot Murong. The army sent in fifteen large trucks and ten smaller pick-ups to move 4,500 people. Some 50 more trucks came the following day. The local government had been preparing for large-scale displacement but apparently had not been given notice of this particular evacuation, and the facilities needed were simply not in place. Drinking water was again a major problem." (ICG 23 July 2003 pp. 4-5)

Main findings and recommendations of the OCHA mission to North Sumatra (April 2003)

- Funds available from the central government to assist IDPs should be utilized more effectively
- Most IDPs would like to return to their place of origin, but security remains the only impediment for their return
- Current working number of IDP families are 23,153, but figures are being verified.
- Provincial authorities received termination funds for 12,000 families at the rate of Rp.8.75m per family of which 7,643 families already received the fund
- No follow-up mechanism in place to assess conditions of the IDPs after they receive termination funds
- Clear gap of communication and information sharing between local authorities and the NGOs.
- No official communication between provincial authorities of Aceh (IDPs originated from) and N. Sumatra (hosting IDPs) in regard to mutual solution to the problem

"Mission Findings/Observations:

The sluggish implementation rate at the provincial level does not meet the Central Government policy requirements. The funds available from the central government should be utilized effectively to minimize IDPs sufferings.

Most IDPs would like to return to their place of origin, repossess their property but security remains the only impediment for their return. Some IDPs are reluctant and expressed that they will never return due to same security reason and past bitter memory. The second group is much comfortable in their current place of displacement.

The fluctuating number of IDPs remains serious constraint for both the government and other actors in making proper plan of action in finding durable solutions to IDPs. The figure fluctuates due to the financial benefit involved at the same time lack of proper registration mechanism in place. The LAs indicated that they would be dispatching verification teams however current working number of IDP families are 23,153.

The Provincial authorities received termination funds for 12,000 families at the rate of Rp.8.75m per family of which 7,643 families already received the fund. Those who have received the termination fund lose their IDP status and are not considered for further assistance though root causes of IDP remains at large. There is no follow-up mechanism in place to assess conditions of the IDPs after they receive termination funds.

Given the diversity of IDPs personal and professional skills, the allocated fund could generate appropriate and sustainable solution if distributed according to the skills of IDPs. For instance, allocation of agricultural plots to farmers or access to fishing equipment for fishermen would help securing their livelihood earnings. Proper planning is essential at all level particularly at the provincial/district level and efficient implementation of these plans would resolve the IDPs problem.

Two international NGOs operating in the area often work in isolation and there has been clear gap of communication and information sharing between local authorities and the NGOs. Lack of communication on NGOs activities created misconception among the provincial and district administration. In bridging the mistrust and easing the current stalemate situation, OCHA Aceh should play the cartelistic role through initiating dialogues and establishing the link between two entities (GoRI/NGOs).

There has been no official communication between provincial authorities of Aceh (IDPs originated from) and N. Sumatra (hosting IDPs) in regard to mutual solution to the problem. Protection of the IDPs properties, repossession rights and/or compensation are important factors should be discussed at the provincial level to establish working relationship in finding durable solution.

Recommendations:

Security remains the first and foremost condition for return of the displaced population from N. Sumatra to Aceh, however the current situation is not conducive for the return.

The provincial authorities in Aceh should take some steps to protect the IDP properties and facilitate repossession of these to the legitimate owner on return.

Appropriate mechanism to be set by the LAs for registration, verification and deregistration of IDPs to come-up with reliable IDP population figure for planning the assistance program.

Information sharing with the LAs would improve GOI/NGO cooperation consequently between [...] (OCHA April 2003, p. 3)

Urgent assistance needed in all sectors in Aceh (February 2003)

- 250,000 people would need urgent humanitarian food assistance for a period of three to six months
- Existing Government food aid programmes do not cover vulnerable groups. WFP will assist them.
- Assistance to the provincial department of health is needed for the implementation of a minimum essential package of services. Return and training of health care staff will be supported.
- Expansion of the peace education project in high schools in close collaboration with provincial education and religious authorities and NGOs. Ongoing emergency education assistance will also be increased
- Water and sanitation situation in conflict-affected parts of Aceh remains unsatisfactory.
- UNDP will focus activities on poverty reduction and economic recovery.
- UNRC in Banda Aceh managed by OCHA plays a crucial role in ensuring effective and efficient coordination of humanitarian activities

"On the basis of the findings of assessment missions undertaken by the UN agencies and (separately) USAID following the signing of the CoHA, there is a consensus that humanitarian assistance should be given in two tempi: urgent assistance to be given with existing funding, mostly by expanding programmes already in hand, while at the same time planning for longer-term assistance, requiring the development of new programmes and new funds. Although the recent developments were not reflected in the likely scenario for Aceh, the recommended priorities aimed at supporting the delivery of essential services and efforts to find durable solutions. While projects included in the CA remain of a high priority nature - although some have required minor revisions - additional funding will be required to address the following sectoral priority needs:

Food security: Estimates are that some 250,000 people would need urgent humanitarian food assistance for a period of three to six months. The total quantity of food required is around 15,000 MTs of rice. WFP food assistance will cover the poorest people in the most conflict-affected areas and target the most vulnerable groups such as widows, orphans, elderly, disabled people, and returnees, as well as other groups whose access to sufficient and nutritious food has been adversely affected due to the conflict. Existing Government food aid programmes do not cover those groups. WFP is not appealing for additional resources for Aceh. Requirements for Aceh will be covered under WFP's existing IDP/Returnee programme under the CA, which has the flexibility to respond to emergent needs like in Aceh. Additional priorities are support to agricultural activities through the distribution of seeds, fertilisers and tools, and the rehabilitation of basic infrastructure in order to enhance food security at community level.

Health: Assistance to the provincial department of health is needed for the implementation of a minimum essential package of services (including to provide immediate support for needed immunisation programmes, combat epidemic scabies and ensure availability of essential drugs), strengthening of human resources and district level management, drug supplies and pharmaceuticals management, as well as psychosocial training and the establishment of referral systems. Rehabilitation of local health centres and treatment of epidemics will also be addressed, and the return and training of health care staff will be supported.

Education: Expansion of the peace education project in high schools in close collaboration with provincial education and religious authorities and NGOs. These efforts will be supplemented by participatory child rights workshops and increased opportunities for children to express their views on their hopes for the future. Ongoing emergency education assistance will also be increased, including the provision of school-in-a-box kits, textbooks, supplies, and teacher training, including in psychosocial support for conflict-affected children. Assistance will be provided to support community-based reintegration activities for youths and separated children.

Water and sanitation: The water and sanitation situation in conflict-affected parts of Aceh remains unsatisfactory. The essential needs are the rehabilitation of existing systems and new water sources as well as the improvement of water-and-sanitation facilities and hygiene promotion at schools.

Rehabilitation of economic infrastructure: In the longer term, humanitarian assistance should transit smoothly into development assistance. Of key importance will be the reconstruction of schools and health centres, the re-employment of teachers and health personnel, and the reconstruction of the agricultural and fisheries sectors. Equally important is the restoration of economic mechanisms and circuits: access to credit, access to markets, freedom of movement for persons and goods, keeping extortion and corruption to a manageable level, and protection of assets. More detailed assessments are required in order to determine the exact requirements in these fields.

UNDP, through the Community Recovery Programme (CRP), will focus activities on poverty reduction and economic recovery. CRP has provided 63 small grants to local NGOs and CBOs in Aceh since 1999, and currently has a pipeline of projects. The programme will target vulnerable poverty-afflicted households including the landless, traditional fishermen, widows, handicapped people, unemployed persons, and possibly ex-combatants. In 2003, CRP will provide support for three area-based programmes in Aceh Besar (12 CBOs in 11 villages), Aceh Tenggara (9 CBOs in 3 villages) and Aceh Barat (28 CBOs in 28 villages), and also provide 25 grants averaging Rp.100,000,000 (about US$ 11,630) per grant to respond to initiatives of local NGOs and CBOs in the six other districts of the province. Total funding requirements for the programme for the year are estimated at US$ 1,200,000. These funds are being raised outside the mechanism of the Consolidated Appeal.

Coordination: With the CoHA, the GoRI plans to enhance its assistance in areas previously inaccessible, while several agencies (development and humanitarian) are planning to expand their ongoing activities and/or begin new programmes. These developments present serious challenges for improved coordination among international organisations and between them, local government and nongovernmental institutions. The UN Resource Centre (UNRC) in Banda Aceh managed by OCHA plays a crucial role in ensuring effective and efficient coordination of humanitarian activities. The needs and requirements of the UNRC are reflected in OCHA's nationwide project in the CAP 2003." (UNOCHA 14 February 2003, pp. 27-28)

Food

Shortages of food and clean water reported in IDP camps (June 2003)

- Some 15,000 displaced by the military in the Jeuli area and were living in tents on a soccer field.
- Food and water shortages have been reported
- Over 700 of them, mainly women and children were suffering from acute respiratory illness, influenza or skin problems

"Food and water shortages have been reported at a camp housing thousands of refugees from the fighting between Indonesian troops and separatist rebels in Aceh province.

As of Monday, more than 15,000 residents from 13 villages in the Jeuli area were living in tents on a soccer field after the military on Friday forced them to leave their homes, local reporters said, quoting data from the refugee command post.

At least 100 tents -- each big enough to house up to 100 people -- had been erected since Friday, local residents said.

More than 700 refugees, mostly women and children, are suffering from acute respiratory illness, influenza or skin problems, a health worker at the camp in Cot Gapu village told reporters.

Some other refugees at the camp are suffering from a lack of clean water and sanitation problems, the Jakarta Post said.

"Many here don't bathe any more," Mustafa Dadih, a 58-year-old schoolteacher, was quoted as saying. "We have problems washing in the morning because there isn't enough water."

As of Saturday, some 25,038 refugees were living in 16 tented camps across the province, said an official with the social affairs ministry.

The second largest group of around 10,200 could be found in South Aceh district, the official, Rinto, told AFP. " (AFP 16 June 2003)

Media report some 13,000 IDPs are starving in North Sumatra (December 2002)

- Media report some 14,000 are going hungry in Langkat
- Basic commodities and cash they receive are not enough to satisfy the minimum requirement for nutrition.

"Around 13,719 Acehnese refugees from 3,045 families, are starving in Langkat, North Sumatra. The basic commodities and cash they receive are not enough to satisfy the minimum requirement for nutrition, Antara news agency reported yesterday. After being driven out of North Aceh, East Aceh and Meulaboh districts of Aceh Province by members of the Aceh Freedom Movement 13 months ago, each family has received only 5 kilos of rice and cash up to Rp75,000. Normally, each individual refugee receives 400 grams of rice and Rp1,500 every day. Due to the lack of provisions, they are becoming emaciated, are lacking vitamins, and many suffer from edema (dropsy). Even menial jobs like building houses, driving becaks and farming are difficult to come by because they have to compete with locals who do not appreciate the influx of refugees desperate for work. As a result, refugees' meagre incomes have little chance of being supplemented by work.

Refugees in the subdistricts of Gebang, Tanjung Pura and Stabat, are a little luckier. They have received funds and basic commodities from the developers of Karang Sari. But this is a temporary solution. Despite various kinds of aid from many sources, parents still do not have enough food for their children, let alone enough money to send them to junior or senior high schools. Scores of representatives of the refugees, headed by Edy Gunawan, recently tried to meet the governor of North Sumatra in Medan to express their worries and seek a solution to their problems. But since the governor was out, they were received by officers from the Social Department, headed by Imran Daulay. The refugees called on the officers to get them jobs, to finance the education of their children and even to send them to Java. Spokesperson of North Sumatra Province, M.L. Tobing, told the refugees that he and officers from the Social Department will discuss their problems with the governor. The officers said they will try to prevent them from starving and to provide more nutritious food for children under five ." (Indonesian Observer 13 December 2002)

Health

62% of Pidie's population infected by scabies (February 2003)

"Pidie District is located 100 - 200 kilometres from Banda Aceh. According to the year 2001 census, 480,100 people live there permanently. Many of them have returned recently after being displaced. In several cases displacement took place several times. Poverty, life in basic conditions, weather conditions and frequent displacement have caused a recent epidemic of scabies. According to rapid assessments by UNICEF and SC USA, approximately 62% of the total population is infected." (UNOCHA 14 February 2003, p. 109)

At least 53 IDPs have died in camps the first 5 months of the military operations (December 2003)

- KONTRAS claims that there have been too many civilian casualties in the IDP camps due to the low level of preparedness.
- At least 53 IDPs have died in the camps due to diseases between June and October 2003.
- Health care, sanitation and provision of food were reportedly inadequate in many camps.

"From the declaration of the Military Emergency to 29 October 2003, at least 53 refugees have died, including 4 babies who had been born in refugee camps. This death rate is too high for the numbers of refugees who had been prepared for beforehand, and it is worse that not all of those who died were of advanced age. For example in Lhokbengkuang camp in Tapaktuan, Teungku Yusman, aged 38, a refugee from Lhok Sialang village, Pasie Raja district, and the father of four small children, died on the night of Monday 19/8 as a result of diarrhoea and fever. This shows that the refugee committee is not working seriously [to provide healthcare].

At Cot Gapu II refugee centre in Bireuen regency, a 5-month old baby was sprawled out, sick, while his four-year old sibling lay sick beside it. The baby's skin had turned white after nearly a week of illness, he had been treated at Bireuen district hospital for three days, but had been forced to return to the camp as his disease was not improving. Because medicine was difficult to get and medical attention scarce, his mother could only give him traditional remedies. Bariah's mother, with tears in her eyes, gave him "village medicine". "My child was in hospital, but was ordered home. Both my children are sick and I don't know how to treat them," she told the newspaper Serambi. When they met the press, the refugees complained about the lack of food and clean water, the filthy environment, and diseases, particularly those that were attacking their children. Adult refugees were generally suffering from diarrhoea, had trouble breathing, had headaches, fever and rashes. Hundreds of them were taking medicine every day. This was acknowledged by Dokter Asriani, the health worker at the camp.

The refugees said that when they asked for water for cooking, drinking, washing or prayer the camp officials always made problems for them. Many refugees said that they were unable to wash for several days at a time. They wanted humanitarian aid to be provided directly to them and not held for them by others.

For the refugees at a camp in Alue Peunyareng village, Meureubo district, West Aceh, the case was different again. Here hundreds of refugees had come down with diseases. Every day around 60 people arrived at the health care post to get treatment. According to the official at the healthcare post, after 8 days in the camp, on Friday 27/6, 679 people had received treatment. This figure included those who had been treated more than once. The illnesses commonly experienced were rashes, flu and anaemia.

In South Aceh around 150 people also suffered from diarrhoea according to statistics collected on 15 July 2003. In Ujong Fatimah refugee camp, Kuala district, Nagan Raya regency, the problems included an unhygienic location for the camp, and many children suffering from rashes and diarrhoea. Hundreds of refugees in Nisam district, North Aceh, fell victim to a number of illnesses. From the beginning of June to the present at least 251 refugees in high schools in Kedue Amplah, Nisam district, have suffered from diarrhoea and rashes, 64 of them have been taken to Lhokseumawe general hospital.

Meanwhile in Trumon and East Trumon districts, three refugees died of malaria and diarrhoea. Two of them were children aged 12-18 months. M. Khadafi (18 months) from Teupin Tinggi died at Kedue Trumon camp, Maimunah (12 months) from Jambo Dalem died in Krueng Luas camp, East Trumon. At Reuleut refugee camp in Muara Batu district, North Aceh, hundreds of refugees fell victim to a number of illnesses, including coughing, fever, and most of all rashes. Housewives with young children were forced to travel up to 300 metres on foot from the camp to find water to wash their clothes, stained by their sick childrens' urine." (KONTRAS 11 December 2003)

Health problems in overcrowded IDP camps (June 2003)

- Health officials claim there is no food shortage and reported that the government would improve water supplies after officials reported that some refugees are suffering health problems due to overcrowding and a lack of clean water
- Acehese IDP are suffering health problems due to overcrowding and lack of clean water.
- Illnesses reported include cases of respiratory problems, skin problems and to a limited extent, diarrhoea.
- Media said there are only 20 lavatories for some 10,000 refugees at Cot Gapu camp.

"Health officials in Indonesia's conflict-hit Aceh province have treated thousands of refugees for illnesses since they were moved into camps around the province to avoid fighting, an official said Wednesday.

Health posts set up within each of the 16 refugee camps have recorded some 14,000 visits by patients since a military operation aimed at crushing separatist rebels began on May 19, said Teuku Muhammad, deputy head of the provincial health agency.

Muhammad listed respiratory ailments, skin disease, bronchitis and diarrhoea among the conditions suffered by the refugees.

"These are ordinary illnesses and we are already treating them," Muhammad told AFP by phone from Banda Aceh. "There are malnourished children."

He said 14,000 is the number of visits, not the number of individual patients treated, and he did not consider the figure to be alarming.

"On a daily basis the number of visits is small," Muhammad said, estimating Aceh's total refugee population at about 32,000.

Authorities prepared the refugee camps after the military said it wanted to separate civilians from the Free Aceh Movement (GAM) rebels. Muhammad said the camps are equipped with tents, kitchens, clean water and toilets.

There is no shortage of medicine, he said. The government said last week it would improve water supplies after officials reported that some refugees are suffering health problems due to overcrowding and a lack of clean water." (AFP 25 June 2003)

"Acehnese refugees forced into camps to escape fighting between Indonesian troops and separatist rebels are suffering health problems due to overcrowding and lack of clean water, an official said Wednesday. Almost 41,000 people have been moved into the tented camps, sometimes against their will, during the first month of a major offensive to crush the Free Aceh Movement.

"We do not have what in medical terms we would refer to as outbreaks but we have begun to register numerous cases of respiratory problems, skin problems and to a limited extent, diarrhoea," said Media Yulizar of the Aceh health office.

Yulizar, who gave no figures, blamed a very limited clean water supply and packed conditions. Yulizar said her office had begun conducting regular anti-mosquito spraying in some camps and immunisation programs for younger children.

"The problem of water for drinking, cooking and washing in Cot Gapu camp is very serious," the UN Office for the Coordination of Humanitarian Affairs said in a report Monday.

"Sanitation problems resulting from the lack of clean water are mounting in the camp."

The UN office said refugees also complained of meagre rations, with rice and some noodles or fish the only items available at the time. It said children were suffering from the intense heat in the open or inside crowded tents.

Many refugees at Cot Gapu have demanded to be allowed to return home, the state Antara news agency said.

Refugees said water has become a luxury, including water for ritual ablutions before the five daily Muslim prayers. Antara said there are only 20 lavatories for some 10,000 refugees." (AFP 18 June 2003)

Shelter and non-food items

26,000 houses burnt since 2001 (April 2004)

- Government reports 26,000 houses destroyed in Aceh since 2001 and less than half of them rebuilt, mainly because of the lack of funds.

"The Secretary of SATKORLAK PBP, DR. Hanif Asmara, informed on Thursday (1 Apr.) that since 2001, a total of 26,000 houses were burnt in the province. Until the end of 2003, the Government has built 10,500 houses and plan to build another 2,500 houses in 2004. The Government has not yet secured fund for rebuilding of another 13,000 houses." (OCHA 3 April 2004)

Vulnerable groups

Many IDPs in North Sumatra still await the termination fund and survive under difficult conditions (April 2004)

- A mapping survey conducted in November 2002 by IMC has revealed that some 12,800 households (62,230 IDPs) were scattered across Langkat District.
- Many of these IDPs have not yet received the promised termination fund of USD1,000 per family.
- Many of the remaining IDPs continues to live in poorly constructed, overcrowded housing, with poor access to essential health care and basic water and sanitation facilities, leading to high morbidity.

"Through a mapping survey in Langkat District in November 2002, IMC identified 12,800 households (62,230 IDPs) scattered across Langkat District. The provincial government has promised to pay a 'termination fund' amounting to approximately US$ 1,000 per family in order for them to forfeit their status as IDPs, but this is yet to be paid to significant numbers of the IDP community. Whilst some IDPs have relocated to Riau and South Sumatra provinces, the remainder continues to live in poorly constructed, overcrowded housing, with poor access to essential health care and basic water and sanitation facilities, leading to high morbidity. The economic capacities of both IDPs and the host communities remain very low, preventing communities to address these needs independently. In order to build on existing coping mechanisms, there is an urgent need to implement livelihood programmes and strengthen existing health structures through capacity building of GoRI health staff and village (Desa) Volunteers (kaders) – Community Health workers (CHWs) and Traditional Birth attendants (TBAs)." (OCHA 9 April 2004, p. 37)

8,700 female-headed households are extremely vulnerable (February 2003)

- As a result of years of conflict, approximately 8,700 female-headed households in Aceh are extremely vulnerable.
- Many of these women are dependent on unsustainable international food aid or on sexual and/or political alliances against their will

"Almost 23% of all households in Aceh are headed by women (174,800 / 760,000). Based on criteria and statistics provided by local NGOs, approximately 8,700 of these households are extremely vulnerable. These unnaturally high numbers are the result of years of violent conflict (killing and disabling hundreds of males every year) and Aceh's steady movement towards limiting social and economic opportunities of females. Women unable to provide resources for their families are frequently forced to depend on unsustainable international food aid, or much worse, sexual and/or political alliances against their will." (UNOCHA 14 February 2003, p. 104)

23,000 children displaced from Aceh face acute problems (February 2003)

- An estimated 23,000 displaced children and children in host communities in Aceh and North Sumatra facing acute problems.

"The protracted conflict in Aceh has left some 23,000 displaced children and children in host communities in Aceh and North Sumatra facing acute problems. Schools and health centres have been destroyed and lack essential supplies and adequately trained staff. Insufficient awareness on child rights has led frequent violations and lack of accountability for violators. Furthermore, for the past 26 years, children and youth have had little or no opportunity to play a constructive or meaningful role in their communities. The recent CoHA presents a renewed opportunity for increased presence and programming in the province." (OCHA 14 February 2003, p. 111)

Central Sulawesi (general)

Assistance during 2004 will aim at empowering communities (2004)

- Assistance during 2004 will focus on supporting the empowerment of communities rather than extend dependencies on material assistance.
- Majority of IDPs are currently living with host families (54,500) in the Poso District.

- Some 11,000 IDPs have been “housed” in crowded purpose-built barracks and the remainder fled to other districts, and to North and South Sulawesi.
- Displaced women and children in barracks are faced with the most serious problems as they are particularly at risk of malnutrition, poor access to sanitation and health services, and untreated mental health problems.
- Children in IDP communities are also suffering from poor health and nutrition levels.
- Some displaced families who have no access to land and have lost their productive assets are likely to seek resettlement rather than return, and will need livelihood and shelter support during the initial phase.

"There are still significant humanitarian concerns in Central Sulawesi. In towns the water supplies are erratic, and in villages people continue drinking unsafe water from springs, wells, and rivers. To improve the water and sanitation situation in the returnee villages and IDP locations, international NGOs are building latrines and rehabilitating water wells. However the coverage is grossly insufficient. The limited availability and quality of health facilities force people to travel long distances to the nearest towns to get simple medical treatment. The health sector is further affected by lack of health staff and medical supplies. The number of schools, both elementary and secondary, is inadequate and many schools often lack supplies, books, teaching materials, adequate classrooms and access to water and sanitation. As most IDPs consider children's education a priority, ensuring that schools are adequately equipped would promote further returns and help the local community as well.

Some local NGOs and community-based organisations (CBOs) have significant capacities but would benefit from better coordination with other agencies, technical assistance and financial support through collaborative projects. There is need for a better coordination mechanism that includes grass root organisations, government as well as international agencies. Support of local capacities needs particularly to focus on those areas most affected by the conflict and areas isolated from usual forms of assistance.

In the changing humanitarian context, there is general consensus amongst all stakeholders that assistance must now support the empowerment of communities rather than extend dependencies on material assistance. Programmes in 2004 should therefore focus more on economic recovery and livelihood support. International NGOs are already shifting from direct assistance to soft loans in their livelihood support activities, FFW and training rather than free distributions. Future assistance should also be carefully balanced between religious groups to avoid jealousy. Continuation of advocacy programmes for the protection of IDP rights, minority and vulnerable groups also remains a priority. " (OCHA 9 April 2004, pp. 15-16)

"Return and resettlement choices are made on the basis of security and the economic incentive of returning to productive assets. In many cases children and wives are left behind for schooling and house garden production while the husband (there are also a significant number of widows) returns to agricultural work at the place of origin. But most IDPs wish to make a permanent return. The majority of IDPs are currently living with host families (54,500) in the Poso District, where some 30% of the population have been displaced. Some 11,000 IDPs have been “housed” in crowded purpose-built barracks and the remainder fled to other districts, and to North and South Sulawesi.

Strategies for addressing the problems will focus on vulnerable groups affected in different ways. Displaced women and children in barracks are faced with the most serious problems: they are unlikely to permanently return to their places of origin in 2003, and are particularly at risk of malnutrition, poor access to sanitation and health services, and untreated mental health problems. Other children in IDP communities are also suffering from poor health and nutrition levels (30% of the children in one district were reported to be malnourished in 2001), and have reduced access to education as school facilities are either overcrowded in influx areas or damaged in areas of origin. Comprehensive support is needed to assist government, civil society and the communities themselves to meet supply and service needs with a focus on health, education and water and sanitation.

Displaced families who belong to minority groups in their places of origin often have no access to land and their productive assets have been destroyed or left behind. They are likely to seek resettlement rather than return, and will need livelihood and shelter support during the initial phase. It is important that assistance for this group bridges rather than divides them from nearby communities. Returnee families, particularly in isolated areas, will need similar support and improved access to health and other necessary public services.

Infrastructure, livelihood support, and the supply of essential services are unlikely to be successful without full attention to assisting the process of reconciliation and re-bridging divided communities. Integral to this assistance is building local capacities to manage and respond to future crises." (OCHA 14 February 2003, p. 12)

"A local NGO reported in August 2002 that the basic needs of displaced persons were not being met, noting the poor nutritional status of children, as well as widespread diarrhea, skin infections, and tetanus from gunshot wounds. A 2001 government mental health assessment indicated that more than 55 percent of those displaced suffered from psychological troubles, while the main health problems were malaria, respiratory infections, gastric-intestinal problems, and skin diseases." (HRW 4 December 2002, p. 39)

Vulnerable groups

Children's access to education and health has been adversely affected (February 2003)

"Inter-communal conflict polarised along Muslim-Christian lines has led to the displacement of at least 80,000 and religious segregation throughout Poso District. For both IDP and host communities, children's access to education and health has been adversely affected; in addition, there are significant needs for greater child rights awareness and special protection on certain issues and for psychosocial support for conflict-affected children." (UNOCHA 14 February 2003, p. 49)

IDPs in urban areas are often the most vulnerable (February 2003)

"In the Poso area of Central Sulawesi, IDPs that live in urban areas are often the most vulnerable. In surveys of the area, CARE has found that urban IDPs had on average higher underweight and wasting levels for children under-five, pregnant and lactating women than IDPs in nearby rural areas. Urban IDPs suffer from a lack of clear title to their assets as well as limited access to employment as a result of the conflict." (UNOCHA 14 February 2003, p.?)

West Kalimantan (general)

Living conditions at the relocation sites partially improved (2004)

- IDPs in Poso who have been resettled in 12 sites are now referred to as "settlers".

- Some 1,259 households have chosen the alternative option of an empowerment package of USD600 per family.
- Improvements of conditions at the relocation sites have been partially successful, thanks to NGO activities.
- Still need for improvements in the health and education sector.

"Since their move to relocation sites, IDPs are being referred to as "Settlers". A total of 1,259 households have chosen the alternative option of a government local settlement ("empowerment") package of IDR 5 million (US$ 600) per family to arrange their own accommodation and living.

The collaboration between the provincial authorities and international NGOs for the provision of assistance at relocation sites has been partially successful in improving agriculture, basic health and hygiene practices, health monitoring systems, water and sanitation, and public infrastructure. In order to provide clean drinking water, water tanks were installed and the supply systems at the settlement sites rehabilitated. NGO activities significantly supplemented government health services and made it possible to reduce death and malnutrition rates. Some efforts have been made in reconciliation and reintegration of settlers into the host community and thus far no major incident has been reported.

There are still needs for improvement in the health and education sectors (access to education, raising awareness, teaching aid and teachers training in relocation sites). Priority should be given to programmes with the element of recovery, economic empowerment of the community in self-reliance, income generating activities, skill development/ vocation training and agriculture development/extension projects." (OCHA 9 April 2004, pp. 21-22)

East Java and Madura (general)

IDPs on Madura Island live in unacceptable conditions (June 2004)

- UN assessment mission reveals that most IDPs wish to return and that in their views lack of funds, not security is the main obstacle to their return
- Food and financial assistance from the government and from WFP, PMI has stopped since December 2002.
- Proposal to extend assistance is still being considered.
- Majority of the IDPs wash and bathe etc. in nearby rivers.
- Free education programs for IDP no longer exists and IDPs are expected to pay fully for their children's education. Many cannot afford to pay for school.
- Many schools treated IDP children like second-class citizens and there were special corners of the classroom intended for IDPs only.
- Employment is scarce on Madura Island

"A joint OCHA/UNICEF/WFP mission to Madura concluded that virtually all 120,000 remaining IDPs from Central Kalimantan desperately want to return, that they no longer regard security as an impediment, but only lack the funds necessary to return and find jobs. Their current living conditions in camps and private housing in Madura are below acceptable standards. A concerted effort needs be made to support the return process in a low-key manner to avoid a recurrence of the violence that erupted in February 2001." (OCHA 30 June 2004)

"Results from a WFP-conducted IDP sample survey (Aug-Sept 2002) indicate that only 58% of IDPs are engaged in seasonal daily work in informal sectors, 71% of whom earn less than 20,000 Rupiah5 (US$ 2.3) per day. A significant proportion of their earning is spent on food. Inadequate education facilities, separate classes for displaced children, higher education costs (tuition and transportation), and, above all, inappropriate curricula are causes of concern for many displaced children. The already poor water supply and sanitation systems that existed within communities have been strained by years of sharing with IDPs and lack of proper maintenance. Insufficiently trained health workers (paramedics/midwives) are running the health care system in rural areas, even though it is often beyond IDPs reach. While increased resources are required to promote a reintegration strategy to facilitate reconciliation and peace building at community levels, assistance in housing, infrastructure development and livelihood recovery would be needed to accelerate the return process." (OCHA 9 April 2004, p. 15)

"Food

Assistance from the government of rice and side-dish money has stopped since December 2002. Assistance from WFP and PMI has also stopped. The IDPs are finding it difficult to find means to buy food. Dinsos has proposed to Central Government to extend food assistance until mid-year. The proposal is still being considered.

Health

Free health services are provided to the IDPs using their red cards (indicates poor people (rakyat miskin), not necessarily IDPs. The IDPs are provided with free services at the clinics, and are also sometimes given referee letters to specialist doctors if necessary.

Water and Sanitation

Water tanks in the host communities and the camps/ IDP sites have been provided by IMC. The majority of the IDPs wash and bathe etc. in nearby rivers.

Education

Scholarships of a 6-month duration were given to IDP schoolchildren at the first instance from the government. The programme no longer exists and IDPs are expected to pay fully for their children's education. Many children no longer continue schooling beyond primary school, as the high schools are further to reach and there is no money for transport to the schools. Students also cannot afford books or school uniforms.

Trauma counseling had been provided to the school children of IDPs in Madura Island from specialists and students from the psychosocial programme at Airlangga University (in Surabaya). The counseling was a way to build the confidence of the children and to get them to go back to school. Many of the schools treated them like second-class citizens and there were special corners of the classroom intended for IDPs only. There are limited classes in the schools available. The number of classes cannot accommodate the number of students.

Employment

Employment is scarce in Madura. Some of the men have become 'becak' drivers, and food-stalls and street-vendors are operated mainly by IDPs. Some are low-paid labour workers, but these jobs are very scarce as there is no industry in Madura.

Reconciliation

Reconciliation processes have been made through cooperation between the provincial governments and the international NGO Common Ground Indonesia. On the day of OCHA's visit, Common Ground Indonesia held a meeting with the East Java Governor and the Bupatis of the four districts to discuss further the possibility of return to Central Kalimantan.

Go & See, and Come & Tell visits are being arranged by the Provincial Government of both Central Kalimantan and East Java." (OCHA February 2003, pp. 3-4)

Morbidity levels are high for IDPs in East Java (February 2003)

- Some 180,000 IDPs in East Java province, 130,000 of them on Madura Island. Most of them originate from Central Kalimantan and were forced to leave following ethnic tensions with the Dayaks in 2001.
- Length of stay (18 months) is causing tensions with local residents.
- Morbidity levels are above the average for IDPs in other areas. Hosts are also affected by the increased pressure on land and available potable water.
- Government assistance focuses on relocation, resettlement and empowerment.
- IDP representatives estimate that up to 75% of IDPs wish to return to Central Kalimantan once the security situation becomes conducive

"The East Java Government officially recognises around 180,000 IDPs. Almost 130,000 of these reside on Madura Island. Most of these IDPs are, or descend from, Madurese who had settled in Central Kalimantan, where they came into conflict with indigenous residents, commonly referred to as Dayaks, in the early months of 2001.

The Central Kalimantan IDPs have now resided in Madura for 18 months and tensions are growing between them and the local Madurese. Anecdotal observations by IMC and WFP data indicate that morbidity levels are above the average for IDPs in other areas, with a staggering 50% of sample respondents reporting juvenile diarrhoea during the seven days prior to survey dates. Downward income trends are also being recorded for hosts, along with increased pressure on limited water and productive land.

Little attention is being paid to displaced children out of school and special needs associated with the conflict. Paramedics and midwives provide most healthcare services. Community mental health problems, associated with the witnessing of violence and the "panic of evacuation", are reported as being serious but unmeasured, particularly amongst children.

Government assistance focuses on relocation, resettlement and empowerment. It was reported that some IDPs are not claiming assistance in Madura as it may jeopardise opportunities for an assisted return at a later date. Nevertheless, nearly 5,000 persons (1,150 households) have received housing assistance packages for resettlement on Madura. Officially, other forms of assistance were terminated at the end of 2001, but IDPs continue to receive food rations and other forms of limited service assistance.

IDP representatives estimate that up to 75% of IDPs wish to return to Central Kalimantan once the security situation becomes conducive. Resources are required to facilitate and promote a reintegration strategy, which can be considered as a long-term strategy. Housing, infrastructure and livelihood support will be required on a large-scale to support returns." (UNOCHA 14 February 2003, p. 24)

Vulnerable groups

54,000 displaced children face acute problems in education, water and sanitation (February 2003)

- Two years after being displaced from Central Kalimantan, some 150,000 IDPs continue to live in difficult conditions on Madura Island.
- Some 54,000 IDP children are estimated to face acute problems in education, water & sanitation.
- Maternal and infant mortality reach high levels.

"Close to two years after brutal violence caused massive displacement of ethnic Madurese from Central Kalimantan, some 150,000 IDPs continue to strain Madura's tight resources and receive only limited humanitarian assistance. An estimated 54,000 displaced children – as well as those among the host population – face acute problems in education, water and sanitation. Maternal and infant mortality rates remain high. While school-age children have swelled enrolment at Madura's existing schools, particularly religious boarding schools (pesantren), out-of-school rates are also reported to be high. Limited water and sanitation facilities have been further stretched by drought. Basic health facilities are lacking, particularly for pre- and post-natal child and maternal care." (OCHA 14 February 2003, p. 99)

East Nusa Tenggara IDPs (general)

Former refugees in West Timor face health and nutrition risks and difficulties in securing livelihood (April 2004)

- Limited access to land, which forced the displaced to share crops with host communities and the suspension of food distribution have fostered food insecurity.
- Limited health facilities, lack of clean drinking water, poor hygiene awareness and an unhealthy living environment have created health and nutrition problems for the displaced.
- Child malnutrition has reached alarming proportions, necessitating emergency assistance through NGOs and UN agencies.

"As many of the former refugees are farmers and access to agricultural land is limited, they have been crop-sharing with the host community, which has caused food insecurity. In addition, prolonged droughts and floods regularly damage crops. The suspension of general food aid by the GoRI in early 2002 contributed to a worsening of the fragile food balance in the camps and settlements. These problems are also affecting host communities. Supporting community resilience through improved livelihood and food security is key to the successful integration and resettlement of former refugees.

Former refugees and local communities continue to face health and nutritional problems, because the local government has limited capacity to respond to major diseases, and the number of health facilities is insufficient. The situation is aggravated by the inadequate supply of clean drinking water, poor hygiene awareness and habits, an unhealthy living environment, and the absence of reproductive health programmes, including prevention programmes for STDs. Child malnutrition has now reached alarming proportions, necessitating emergency assistance through NGOs and UN agencies. Assistance to the general West Timorese population in this regard is not only a life-saver for many children, but also a necessity in order to avoid jealousy between the host population and the former refugees.

Access to primary health care (preventive and curative) with basic minimum standards and to safe water and sanitation through the installation and rehabilitation of the water supply system and drainage facilities needs to be immediately improved.

After four years, former refugee children are still experiencing difficulties integrating into local schools due to inadequate teacher support and the inability to pay tuition fees and school supplies.

Despite UNHCR's intense efforts over the last three years, 385 cases of children separated from their parents both in Indonesia and Timor Leste continue to be a major concern for the protection of child rights." (UNOCHA 9 April 2004, p. 17)

ACCESS TO EDUCATION

General

Aceh Barat (62%) and Aceh Utara (39%) have the highest rates of non-attendance mainly because of lack of access (June 2002)

- 3 indicators were used, all of which explore the three most common reasons cited by households as to why children are not attending school: children must work, families cannot afford school fees and children do not have access to a school in their area.
- 72% of all IDP children (age 6 to 15) surveyed attend school, 11% have stopped attending school and 17% have never attended school.
- Makassar (19%), Deli Serdang (18%), Kolaka (16%) and Kampar (16%) cite the school fees as the main obstacles.
- 2 districts have large percentages of households reporting no access to education- Aceh Utara with 39% of respondents and Aceh Barat with 58% of respondents.
- 20 districts (39%) have between 10 to 30 percent of household respondents indicating their children are not in school.

"IDP household respondents reported on how many of their school-aged children are currently enrolled in primary and secondary school. There are 7,500 school-age children (ages 6 to 15) in the sample. Of these, 1,252 (16.7%) have never attended school, 859 (11.5%) have stopped attending school, and 5,389 (71.9%) are still attending school. The study investigated reasons why IDP children had never attended school or stopped attending school. The results are for the sub-set of households that have children who are not attending school, not for the entire IDP sample population.

District-Level Analysis

Approximately three-quarters of districts (38) have households that report children are not enrolled in school because they must work, with a mean percentage of 4%. However, the majority of these districts (24 or 63%) have less than 5% of household respondents indicating children are working. Sampang district has the highest percentage of households with children who are working, representing 17% of households in this district. Other districts with similarly high percentages include Pontianak Urban (13%), Lumajang (13%), Kampar (11%), Bangkalan (10%), and Pontianak Rural (10%).

A total of 39 districts (76%) have households that report children do not attend school because the family cannot afford school fees. The average percentage of households that cannot pay these fees is 5%, with 19 districts reporting this is the case. Over one-quarter of districts (11 or 28%) have over 10% of households that cannot pay school fees. Makassar has the highest percentage of respondents, with 19%. Additional higher-level districts include Deli Serdang (18%), Kolaka (16%) and Kampar (16%).

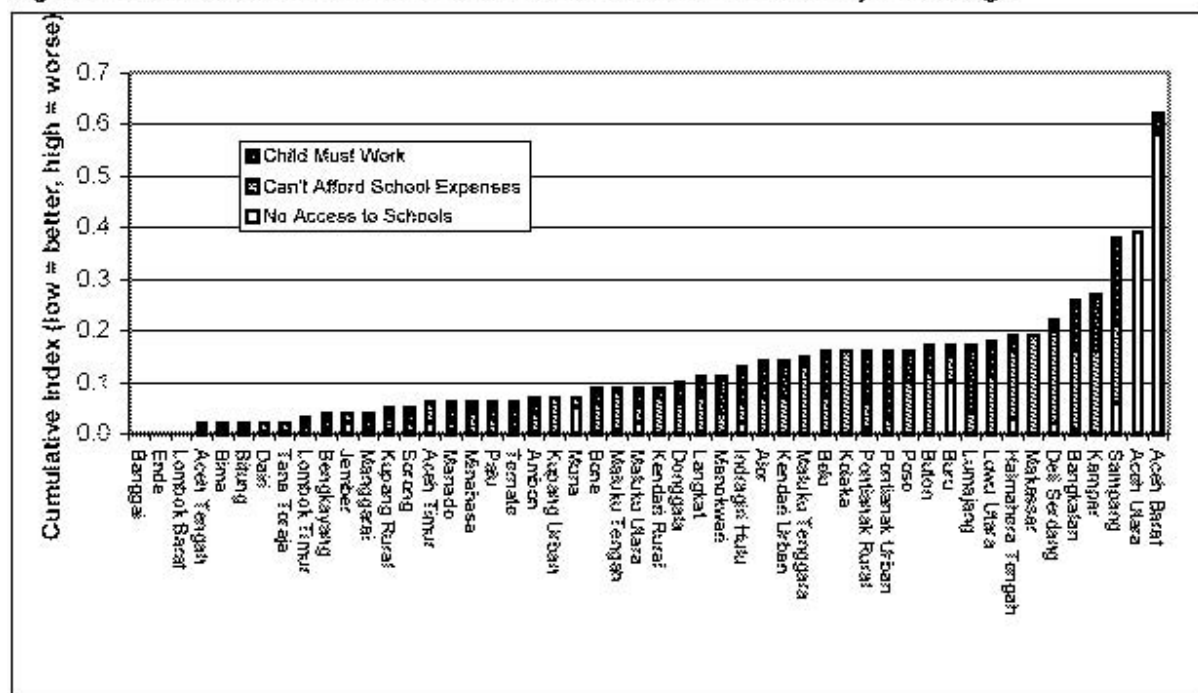

Less than one-third of all districts (16 or 31%) report children are not enrolled in school because they have no access to schools. The majority of these districts, 14 or 88%, have 10% or less of households responding that this is the case. Two districts have large percentages of households reporting no access to education- Aceh Utara with 39% of respondents and Aceh Barat with 58% of respondents.

Figure 24 provides a cumulative percentage of the three education indicators for each district. In three districts, households did not provide information on why children (ages 6 to 15) are not attending school. For two of these districts, Ende and Banggai, all eligible children are currently enrolled in school. The remaining district, Lombok Barat, has some eligible children not enrolled, however households in these districts did not provide additional information.

The district with the highest percentage of household respondents indicating their children are not attending school is Aceh Barat with 62% of respondents, followed by Aceh Utara with 39%. For both these districts, the primary reason children are not attending school is that there is no access to education in the area. For Sampang district, with 38% of households, the primary reasons for nonattendance are children must work (17%) and families are unable to afford school fees (15%).

As Figure 24 shows, 20 districts (39%) have between 10 to 30 percent of household respondents indicating their children are not in school. Over half of these districts (11) report that the inability to pay school fees is the primary reason for why children are not in school, while the districts of Kolaka and Makassar report this is true in all cases. An additional six districts report that the primary reason children are not attending school is that they must work. One district reports the primary reason for non-attendance is no access to education and two districts have an equal number of respondents that cite children are not in school because of inability for families to pay school fees and that children must work.

Figure 24: Reasons for non-enrollment in school for children 6-15 years of age.

Socio-Economic Analysis

Reasons for non-attendance at school do not vary significantly by gender of the household head or by religion (Table 11). Elderly households report more problems with children having access to schools, but their ability to pay fees is the same as for non-elderly households. Ethnically, Acehnese have much less access to schools than do other groups. Bugis, Butonese and Flores ethnic groups report having the most difficulty in paying for education. Poso/Pamona, Timorese and Madurese ethnic groups report the highest rates of non-attendance because children must work. As expected, households that have been displaced for a longer duration have greater access to schools. Inability to pay school fees is more common among recently displaced IDPs, while children from households that have been displaced the longest are more likely to work.

By living situation, findings show that non-camp dwelling IDPs have greater access to schools than households in camp settings. Non-camp households also report inability to pay school fees more frequently than camp-dwelling households." (WFP Livelihood Survey: Synthesis report June 2002, pp. 44-46)

Aceh

More than 600 schools burned down since the beginning of the military operation (December 2003)

- More than 600 schools have burnt down in Aceh since the beginning of the offensive.
- The perpetrators of these arson attacks are unclear or unidentified.
- There is a sharp contrast in official figures with regards to the number of repaired buildings and local data, which suggest that out of 603-burnt schools, only 28 units have been fully renovated.
- Government attributes full responsibility of the burning down of schools to GAM and claims it has rebuilt 549 schools.

"The widespread burning of schools as a strategy of war by the two parties to the conflict has left 40 000 children without an opportunity to study, because more than 600 schools (with 4029 rooms, including classrooms and teachers' offices) were destroyed between the start of the Military Emergency on 19 May 2003 and October 27 2003. 400 more had been destroyed before the Emergency, and have yet to be rebuilt. This phenomenon is clearly a 'grand scenario' created by the two parties to the conflict to increase their political bargaining positions, since the idea of burning schools would not appear without some political calculation behind it. Apart from the political interests of the two parties to the conflict, the arsons will have a strong effect on the progress of the younger generation, and Acehnese society will be held back several decades as a result. Aceh will lose its potential to develop itself. A systematic process of creating ignorance like this will have lasting results and weaken the people of Aceh.

Statistics from the Aceh provincial Education Department state that 130 467 pupils in Aceh have stopped their schooling – the number of illiterate people is not yet counted. In Pidie regency the rebuilding of burnt schools has been delayed, although the regency government claims that 80-100% have been completed. There have been debates over who has authority over the lucrative development projects between the Education Department and the local government, and there has been no efficient use of time, such that there are no signs of the development projects being completed. It's feared that the next school term will be cut short.

At the moment the education sector in Aceh is truly in a terrible state. It won't belong before Aceh will be ranked most backward of all the provinces, made worse by the prolonged armed conflict. The burnings and destruction of more than 905 schools has left thousands of children studying in emergency makeshift conditions. Shootings of and terroristic threats against teachers have made the education system even worse. Thousands of children are threatened with the possibility of having to give up school. From the Aceh province Education Department's figures, at least 55 000 children have been forced to stop their schooling for various reasons. 15 000 of those were forced to stop their schooling while still in primary school." (KONTRAS 11 December 2003)

"With regards to education, more than 600 school buildings have been burnt and books and other materials have been lost. Returnee students are often having to study in tents with UNICEF-donated school kits. In addition, there is a sharp contrast in official figures with regards to the number of repaired buildings and local data, which suggest that out of 603-burnt schools, only 28 units have been fully renovated while the rest are currently being handled in an emergency manner." (ICVA 5 September 2003. p. 2)

"It is still an unanswered question as to which side is responsible for the burning of more than 500 schools across Aceh since the military emergency began. It is clear, from ICG interviews, that GAM members were responsible for some. The alleged motivation may have been to prevent the schools from being used as billets for troops, to prevent them from housing the displaced so that the humanitarian problem would get more international attention, or to ensure that they were not used to turn Acehnese children into Indonesians. But most Acehnese with whom ICG spoke expressed scepticism that so many schools could have been burned so quickly without some level of complicity on the part of government forces." (ICG 23 July 2003, pp. 1-2)

Violence and insecurity hamper education in Aceh (July 2002)

- Teachers and school children are driven away from school because of the insecurity and the violence.
- In Pidie and North Aceh more than 25% of children who were registered in school have "vanished" and no longer go to school."

"The education in Aceh has been devastated because of the arson on the schools and the endless armed conflict. The arson and armed conflict drive away the teachers from Aceh. They flee because of the security reason. The arson and armed conflict have side effect on the devastation of the economic of the society, therefore the children could not continue study.

Such situation brings negative impact on children's development. According to the data from Crisis Education center, at this moment, there are 8.210 drop out children, 14.050 children at the age of 6-12 and 2.091 at the age of 13-15 never had education, 10.125 are at the risk of drop out, and more than 752 children became beggars in some regency areas in Aceh. This number does not include the children who work as scavengers and construction workers in various cities. In fact, they are not capable to work as adult, but they had to because they have to survive.

For the last three years, the condition of education in Aceh was fall off. According to the head of the Nangroe Aceh Darusallam (NAD) education taskforce, Mr. Syahbuddin AR, the education plunge has reached "red light ". He adds that 25 % of children, who used to go to school, do not go to school anymore.

Because the lack of security, numerous teachers who live in Aceh could not teach. Therefore, the learning process does not run properly. Classes are always empty without students and teachers. Students do not go to school because usually the teachers do not come to school. The excuse of teachers is that "school is not safe anymore".

The reason of falling quality of education in Aceh is the arson of the school from elementary school to Senior High School in the last here years that caused the education process runs in abnormal way. Ten thousands students of Elementary, junior high school and senior high school must learn at meunasah (small mosque), mosque, or under emergency tents.

The education quality that has reach "red light" is in Pidie, Bireuen, North Aceh, East Aceh, West Aceh, South Aceh, and 2 districts in central Aceh regency. According to the research of National education taskforce of NAD province that the indication of this "red light" is in the level of participation of students and teachers from the previous 98,5% to 71,5 %. The worse ratio of children who go to school and those who do not is found in the regencies of Pidie and North Aceh. In these regencies, more than 25% of children who were registered in school have "vanished" and no longer go to school." (ACRA July 2002)

West & Central Kalimantan

3,000 IDP children in Pontianak have no access to education (February 2003)

- 600 IDP children attend school in Pontianak while their parents have moved to resettlement sites.
- Some 3,000 IDP children do not have access to education

"In Pontianak, West Kalimantan, there are nine local schools with 600 IDP children attending however, 3000 IDP children do not have access to basic education. IDP children remain in Pontianak to access education after their parents have moved to resettlement areas. Schools are planned for 3/10 resettlement sites. GoRI officials articulate the need for education programmes to support communities learn to live and work together and to overcome underlying conflict and tensions. There are no other international or national NGOs supporting the formal education sector." (OCHA 14 February 2003, p. 115)

ISSUES OF SELF-RELIANCE AND PUBLIC PARTICIPATION

Livelihood opportunities for the displaced

Aceh Utara, Aceh Tengah, Aceh Timur and Kupang Rural hardest hit by poverty and unemployment (June 2002)

- Unemployment rates are high throughout the sample, averaging 53.6 percent for the entire sample population.
- Six districts in particular - Aceh Tengah, Aceh Utara, Aceh Barat, Aceh Timur, Kupang Rural and Tana Toraja - have unemployment rates of 85% or higher.
- Almost all districts have at least 30 percent of IDP households below the poverty line.
- The average percentage of IDP households below the poverty line, by district, is 55%
- Aceh Utara, Aceh Tengah, Aceh Timur and Kupang Rural have cumulative scores above 2.5, indicating that unemployment and poverty are the highest in these districts.
- Poverty and employment values vary greatly among ethnic groups.
- Religious affiliation has no bearing on poverty levels or unemployment levels.
- Poverty rates of IDP households decline significantly for longer periods of displacement
- Income increases significantly the longer households are displaced.

"Employment is essential to the livelihood of the vast majority of IDP households, not only to purchase essentials such as food and medicine, but also to send children to school and provide for other needs. Even though many households have access to land for growing food, the majority are still dependent on purchasing food and other essentials.

The level of poverty among IDP households is linked to each District's poverty line. This is an income-based measure of poverty and reflects households' ability to convert labor to income.

District Level Analysis

Three variables were selected from the data set to characterize the poverty and employment status of IDPs in the survey: unemployment rate, household dependence on day labor, and households below the district-level poverty line. Unemployment rate was calculated for each district in the sample by dividing the total number of employed adults age 16 and over by the number of adults aged 16 and over, with a resulting ratio ranging from 0 to 1. Household dependence on day labor was computed using the percentage of respondents who reported receiving their wages on a daily basis as opposed to either a weekly or monthly basis. Thus, it is the fraction of respondents reporting daily wages, and varies from 0 to 1. The third indicator, households below the district-level poverty line, is the fraction of households whose income is below the poverty line for the district in which they currently reside. It, too, ranges from 0 to 1.

Unemployment rates range from 28% in Lombok Timur to 100 percent in Aceh Tengah and Aceh Utara (Figure 9). In general, unemployment rates are high throughout the sample, averaging 53.6 percent for the entire sample population. The unemployment distribution is negatively skewed (-.237) and much greater than its standard error of .033, suggesting that unemployment is not symmetrical. Six districts in particular - Aceh Tengah, Aceh Utara, Aceh Barat, Aceh Timur, Kupang Rural and Tana Toraja - have unemployment rates of 85% or higher. These six represent a distinct grouping of high unemployment as Figure 9 clearly shows.

Household dependence on day labor is based on respondents' primary employment and whether or not this employment is paid on a daily as opposed to a weekly or monthly basis. Districts where a large percentage of respondents report receiving daily wages for their primary employment are, therefore, highly dependent on day labor for this income. Figure 10 shows the district-level index for day-labor dependency. Here the variation among districts is large, ranging from below 10 percent in Kendari, Halmahera Tengah, Kupang Urban and Manggarai to 100 percent in much of Aceh and Kupang Rural. Day-labor dependency will depend on the types of employment opportunities available in a particular district, but there is a strong correlation ($p = .026$) between day labor dependency and poverty.

There is a distinct break in day-labor dependency between Sorong and Buton (Figure 10), where from Buton on roughly half or more of the IDP population relies on daily wages. Up to Sorong, less than one-third rely on daily wages. This break may signify those districts that are dependent and non-dependent on day-wage labor for household income.

Figure 11 shows the scale of poverty among IDP households. As can be observed, almost all districts have at least 30 percent of IDP households below the poverty line. The average percentage of IDP households below the poverty line, by district, is 55%. This compares unfavorably to the overall average of district-level poverty in Indonesia, according to BPS, of 19%⁷. Only two districts, Kupang Urban and Manggarai, have poverty levels below 20 percent. A total of 31 out of the 50 districts (62%) have poverty levels of 50 percent or higher. The poverty outlook is particularly grim in Aceh, where over 90 percent of households fall below the poverty line. Figure 12 provides the fraction of houses where the head of household earns less than US$1.00 per day.

Combining the four employment and poverty indicators into an index of poverty and employment yields the results shown in Figure 13. The maximum cumulative score of 4.0 would indicate that a particular district had the worst-case scenario for each of the four indicators. Such is the case for Aceh Utara and Aceh Tengah. These three districts and two others, Aceh Timur and Kupang Rural, had cumulative scores above 2.5. Five districts also had cumulative scores below 1.0: Pontianak Rural, Ende, Manokwari, Kupang Urban and Manggarai.

Figure 13 can be used to compare the relative contribution of each indicator to the overall index for each district. For example, Tana Toraja District has an overall score of just under 2.0. It has a large percentage of households below the poverty line, a high level of unemployment, but a relatively low level of dependence on day labor. This could mean, for example, that wages for weekly and monthly employment are very low compared to what would place a household over the poverty line. Conversely, Bima has a high dependency on daily wage labor, yet relatively fewer households below the poverty line and unemployment rates. The exact interpretation for each district will depend on the economic factors being experienced within each district.

Socio-Economic Analysis

Employment and poverty indicators were analyzed using five socio-economic variables of importance to the IDP setting: gender, household age, ethnicity, religion and duration of displacement. As Table 6 shows, poverty is significantly higher for female-headed households than for male-headed households (67.8 and 56.7 percent, respectively). Femaleheaded households also experience significantly higher rates of unemployment while earning significantly lower per capita income. Only their change in per capita income is lower, but this is due to mostly to their lower income averages prior to displacement.

The household age variable separates elderly from non-elderly households. For this study, an elderly household is defined as a household whose head is 51 years or older, and has no working members under the age of 51. Of the total sample, 431 households (7.9%) are classified as elderly. Approximately 21 percent of female-headed households are elderly, compared with only 6.6 percent of male-headed households.

Elderly households fare worse than non-elderly households in poverty (69.8 and 56.7 percent, respectively) and have, as expected, higher rates of unemployment. Their median monthly per capita income is only 33,333 Rupiah, meaning that 50% of the households are managing on this level of income or less. In contrast, the median per capita income for younger households is over twice this amount, or 75,000 Rupiah.

Poverty and employment values vary greatly among ethnic groups represented in the study. Acehnese have the highest rate of poverty, with 96% of households falling below their District poverty level. Likewise, Acehnese suffer very high unemployment and low per capita incomes. Bima and Makassar, in contrast, show relatively low rates of poverty and unemployment and significantly higher incomes. Flores/Alor households have the lowest poverty rates and the highest per capita incomes but relatively high unemployment (perhaps due to high numbers of farmers).

Religious affiliation has no bearing on poverty levels or unemployment levels (Table 6). Christian households have higher mean per capita income levels but the median per capita income is only slightly higher than Muslim households. Muslim households have suffered significantly larger declines in per capita income, averaging greater than 150,000 Rupiah per month compared with just under 50,000 Rupiah for Christian households.

Duration of displacement is a key dimension in poverty and unemployment rates among IDP households. Poverty rates of IDP households decline significantly for longer periods of displacement. For those households displaced for a short time period (nine months or less), 74% are under their district poverty level (Table 7). This rate drops to 56.2% and 51.8%, respectively, for medium and long periods of displacement. This trend is similar for unemployment rates that decline about 20% over time, from 63.7% for short duration of displacement to 50.6% for long.

Income increases significantly the longer households are displaced. The average per capita income for households displaced for nine months or less is slightly over 57,000 Rupiah. Medium term households have almost double this income (104,000 Rupiah) while those households displaced longer than 18 months have the highest per capita income at 112,000 Rupiah per month. There is a significant trend in increasing income ($p < .05$), whereby each month of displacement accounts for an increase in per capita income of 2,127 Rupiah.

Livelihood opportunities for the displaced from Aceh

Poverty on rise in Aceh since the May 2003 military operation (December 2003)

- Military operations has worsened already difficult living conditions for most civilians in Aceh.
- The number of people classified as poor in Aceh in 2001 was 1.2 million. In 2003 it was 1 703 897 people or around 40% of the population.
- Destruction of livelihoods have forced many children to start working in the informal sector in the capital
- According to the Central Statistics Agency of North Aceh, the conflict in North Aceh has caused 15 000 citizens to move to other areas since 1999

"The Military Emergency has helped to worsen economic problems like unemployment, poverty and displacement of people. The people are less productive, as their freedom to make a living has been reduced by the poor security situation. Massive displacement of people has caused many people to stop being active participants in the economy and instead become passive consumers of state subsidies and charity. In the most extreme cases we are seeing the growth of a new class of beggars and vagrants in the cities of Langsa, Lhokseumawe, Bireun, sigli and Banda Aceh.

The loss of employment opportunities and the destruction of the people's economic infrastructure in the villages is very bad for Aceh. People's purchasing power has dropped between 2001 and 2003. The number of people classed as poor in Aceh in 2001 was 1.2 million. In 2003 it was 1 703 897 people or around 40.39% of the population. The number of the poorest people continues to grow in three regencies, namely North Aceh, East Aceh and Pidie. The number of openly unemployed has reached 48.8% of the 2 million-strong workforce.

The destruction of the people's economic livelihood has caused a rise in the number of street children and of children working in the informal sector. Information on children obtained by KontraS shows that there are 306 street children and children working in the informal sector in Banda Aceh. 75 % of these children said they were forced to work or to live on the streets because their families' livelihoods had been destroyed.

The flight of capital and labour power from the regions of Aceh, and from the provincial capital, has weakened the investment climate. Many village workers, accustomed to work in agriculture, plantations, and forestry, have moved to the city, and work in the informal sector as builders' labourers, street vendors, and, indeed, probably, many have become beggars or criminals. According to the Central Statistics Agency of North Aceh, the conflict in North Aceh has caused 15 000 citizens to move to other areas since 1999. The figure was obtained from comparing population projections before and after the election and household registration was carried out. Before the registration census the projection was a population of 467 000. After 90% of the registrations had been carried out, it was estimated that the real population of North Aceh is now 450 000, caused by the exodus from the terror and kidnappings.

The Military Emergency has led to frequent gun battles and other acts of violence which have caused price instability in traditional markets, as many are afraid to travel to work, and the availability of goods is therefore variable. Members of the security forces have become involved in 'mafia' operations smuggling imported goods from Singapore (luxury cars, sugar, etc) through the Sabang free trade port, which has also worsened conditions in traditional markets. The cost of paying for the TNI and police to guard their goods is borne by the traders, which also leads to a rise in prices. The irregularity of supply of goods to Aceh is a secondary factor in all this - the primary factor is the lack of security for business in Aceh." (KONTRAS 11 December 2003)

Martial law in Aceh brings hardship at the grassroot community level (October 2003)

- Due to the war the economy at the grassroots community level is reportedly collapsing.
- Restrictions on access to farms, working hours and the setting up of military check points is negatively affecting the livelihoods of many civilians.

"After observing more than 100 days of the implementation of the Military Emergency in Aceh, no significant results have been achieved since martial law began, except a humanitarian crisis. Hundreds of members and sympathizers of the Free Aceh Movement (GAM) were killed by Indonesian Army and most of them were unlawfully killed. Military publications [on the killings] were not verified independently and their validity has to be doubted. In regard to the humanitarian situation, the economy at the grassroots community level is collapsing. Below are three examples of the difficulties facing villagers.

1. Villagers who want to go to their embankments [farms] have been obligated to present themselves at the Indonesian Defense Forces (TNI) post in Kuala Simpang Ulim, East Aceh regency. They have to hand over their red and white ID cards [1] before they are allowed to go to the embankments.

2. Villagers have only been allowed to carry out their work from 10.00 to 13.00. After that, they have to go back to the TNI post to take back their ID cards and then go home. If this rule is violated, TNI will take arbitrary actions against the villagers, such as beatings, etc. Therefore only a few people have been brave enough to carry out their work, because three hours is not enough to do their kind of work. The villagers (workers and owners of the embankments) are being attacked with this kind of rule.

3. Since the Military Emergency came into effect on May 19, Lokop district in East Aceh has been cut off by a TNI blockade. Lokop is a remote district in the mountains of East Aceh regency. All vehicles and people heading for Lokop are strictly searched by TNI, particularly those carrying basic foodstuffs. TNI is applying the following rules: (a) shop-owners and traders may only carry three sacks of rice and one sack of sugar; and (b) families may only buy 1 liter of rice and 500 grams of sugar per day. If people breach these rules they are accused of being GAM members. However, there are around 30 villages in Lokop district, so the people of Lokop have suffered greatly from malnutrition since the beginning of the Military Emergency. The prices of basic needs, such as kerosene and sugar, have skyrocketed. Besides this, it is very hard for the people to work their fields and rice paddies. Crops such as rice, cocoa and coffee are left to rot because of the difficulty of transporting them anywhere. TNI also forces farmers to sell their rice and other crops at low prices to middlemen named by TNI, to avoid the crops being sold to GAM. After three months of the military emergency, the condition of the people of Lokop is a cause of great concern. Their food supplies are increasingly limited, leading to malnutrition. The same rules are applied to fishermen who want to carry out their work at sea. Troops of TNI/Police give them only three hours to work from 10.00 to 13.00. According to local fishermen, this rule is impossible to accept, because the average fisherman with a small boat needs a day at sea to catch fish. Those with bigger boats need two or three days at sea for fishing. And now, none of the fishermen are able to carry out their work. Subsequently, the families of fishermen are facing a growing economic crisis in their ability to obtain their daily food needs [2].

The above examples are clear evidence of how grassroots communities are facing economic collapse as a result of the martial law and the implementation of military rule in Aceh." (Laksamana.net 2 October 2003)

DOCUMENTATION NEEDS AND CITIZENSHIP

Documentation needs (Aceh)

All residents in Aceh required to obtain new 'red & white' identity cards (August 2003)

- As of August 2003, some 70 % of Aceh residents had obtained their new ID card
- Martial law administration has required Acehnese to obtain the special red & white ID cards, which are aimed at separating civilians from GAM members.
- The process of obtaining the ID card is long and involves many administrative steps.
- The official rationale for issuing new ID cards is because GAM had stolen many old ID cards in order to move around and pass check-points
- It is not clear what would prevent them from doing so with the new ID cards.

"Currently, 70 % of the populations who must possess ID card have had the red-and-white card in their hands. The purpose of the introduction of the red-and-white ID card is to separate the civilians from AASM members. AASM had used a strategy by seizing the civilians' ID cards to confuse TNI and Police (Polri)." (Government of Indonesia 10 August 2003)

"The martial law administration has required Acehnese to obtain the special ID cards, which are aimed at separating civilians from GAM members.

The administration has set a deadline of July 31 for residents to obtain the new IDs, and has said it will launch a major ID operation starting Aug. 1.

An applicant must go through a long process that may take two weeks before he finally obtains the new ID card. The ID must be signed by the chief of the district where the applicant lives, the governor and the martial law administrator.

An applicant needs to first obtain a clearance from his village chief and local military chief before the district administration will issue the card. The applicant must then submit the card to the local police station for the police chief's signature before getting the district chief's signature. Afterwards, the applicant must register his ID number with the martial law administration.

But many said a Rp 5,000 (about 60 US cents) bribe to the right person in the district administration office could considerably speed up the process.

Although the new ID cards are supposed to be free, many residents have complained about the length of time required and the extra money they have to fork out on transportation.

"We were lucky as we applied for the IDs while we were still in the refugee camp in Gede Amplah so we didn't have to go back and forth to the district office like other people," said Zainuddin, a resident of Bandar Kalifah hamlet, Alue Papeun village, Nisam district, about one hour's drive from the district administration office.

Getting the new IDs, however, by no means solves the security problems plaguing the Acehnese as GAM members are reportedly determined to thwart the new ID card arrangements.

A resident of Matang Reudeup, who was speaking on condition of anonymity, claimed that a GAM member had seized his newly issued ID card two weeks ago.

"He greeted me politely and asked me where I had been. I told him I had just been getting my new ID card. He asked me to show it and then took it off me, saying that these cards were unacceptable. So I had to get another one made," he told the Post at the Baktiya district administration offices on Thursday.

District chief Ismuhadi said that the process for those whose new IDs had been seized by GAM would be shorter as there was no need for both the civilian and the martial law administrations to screen them for possible involvement in the rebel movement.

"As of today, we have issued 5,949 new IDs out of a total of 8,000 blank cards. Thus, we can say that 60 percent of residents have obtained the new IDs," he added.

He said that as the military operation intensified and reached remote villages, more and more applicants had been coming forward in the last week. About 300 new applicants came to his office on Thursday alone, Ismuhadi said.

As for the long delays in the issuing of the new IDs, Ismuhadi explained that his office was short of staff as many officials had been warned by GAM not to report for work. In addition, his office only had six typewriters.

"I doubt if we can issue new IDs for all the residents by the end of this month, unless we get help from both the police and the military," he added.

Martial law administration spokesman Navy Col. Ditya Soedarsono said rather disingenuously that ID card checks would be held merely to ascertain whether the administration had its their duty in providing service to the public." (The Jakarta Post 28 July 2003)

"If the screening is restricted to civil servants, including schoolteachers and university lecturers, and local representatives, all residents of Aceh without exception are required to obtain new "Red and White" identity cards, known as KTPs. The original rationale for the new cards was that GAM had stolen hundreds of the old ones, creating two problems. GAM members who had no fixed place of residence and therefore no valid cards were able to pass through army and police checkpoints using stolen cards. And ordinary villagers who had had their cards stolen were unfairly suspected of being GAM members when they were unable to produce cards on demand.

How the new cards would prevent the same problems from arising is not clear; they are presumably equally subject to loss and theft. But the process for applying for them involves a demonstration of loyalty very similar to the civil service screening. Every applicant must be declared clean of any GAM involvement by the local police. He or she must fill out a form that asks for information on family, friends, activities over the last three months, activities over the last year, and so on. The cards, when issued, are signed by the village head, the district police and military commanders, and the district head.

The difficulty here is not just that the information can be manipulated and misused in the current climate; it is also that there is a strong likelihood that Acehnese, even in relatively secure areas, will be charged a fee for the form, despite the government's insistence that there will be no illegal levies. If this happens, it will be another strike against winning hearts and minds." (ICG 23 July 2003, p. 3)

Documentation needs (West & Central Kalimantan)

Displaced Madurese who have become "settlers" have not been issued identity cards (2004)

- Some 78,000 ethnic Madurese who were displaced in 1999 in West Kalimantan and sought refuge in the capital Pontianak, where they stayed for 3 years, have been provided with relocation housing in 12 relocation sites.
- The displaced, who have become "settlers", are still in need of assistance. They have not been issued identity cards by the governments and are often denied access to basic public services.
- Also they don't have legal rights of use of the land and houses they have been allocated.

"A conflict between ethnic Malay and Dayak groups on the one side, and ethnic Madurese migrants on the other, erupted in 1999 in Sambas and Singkawang, West Kalimantan, causing 78,000 Madurese to flee from their homes to the provincial capital Pontianak where they were accommodated in public facilities until June 2002. After the murder of several Madurese who had returned to Sambas to dispose of their property, the possibility of a general return of the IDPs was ruled out. Therefore the GoRI, through the Department of Manpower and Transmigration and the Department of Resettlement and Regional Infrastructure, provided relocation housing for most IDPs in 12 relocation sites. In addition to housing, the GoRI also provided 11,000 families of agricultural background with two hectares of agricultural land per family. Since their move to relocation sites, IDPs are being referred to as "Settlers".

While there has been some improvement of services and infrastructure, all problems affecting the settlers as well as the local community are far from resolved. The government has not issued identity cards to the settlers, which has limited or often denied them access to basic public services and determination of their legal status. The settlers do not have legal rights of use or ownership documentation for the government allocated agricultural land and houses at relocation sites." (OCHA 9 April 2004, p. 21)

Citizenship [East Nusa Tenggara]

Ex-refugees in West Timor to choose between Indonesian citizenship and temporary resident status (April 2004)

"A Presidential Decree adopted in May 2003 and subsequent instructions from the Department of Home Affairs provided the former refugees in West Timor with an opportunity to register either as Indonesian citizens or accept temporary resident status (in anticipation of future return). The registration is combined with the issuance of relevant documentation, including Identity Cards." (UNOCHA 9 April 2004, p. 17)

Some 30,000 to 50,000 East Timorese refugees to lose refugee status by December 2002 (June 2002)

- Repatriation assistance for East Timorese refugees will cease after 1 September 2002. Consequently, they will be considered as Indonesian citizen and asked to join resettlement programmes like the other IDPs. Some 30-40,000 East Timorese have still not returned to East Timor, most of them sheltered in West Timor.

- UNHCR announced that East Timorese refugees will lose refugee status by 31 December 2002 as conditions are now considered conducive for return.

"Indonesian authorities said East Timorese refugees have to make a decision by the end of August whether they want to return to their home country or stay in Jakarta, according to a news report on Wednesday.

The Jakarta Post quoted Stanis Tefa, director of the province's social affairs bureau, as saying that the government would no longer organize repatriation programs for East Timorese refugees after September 1.

After that deadline, refugees have to shoulder repatriation expenses themselves. Refugees not returning would be presumed to be Indonesian citizens and would be asked to join resettlement programs to move them to other provinces, Tefa said.

Between 30,000 and 40,000 East Timorese refugees are still living in makeshift camps in the Indonesian-ruled West Timor and other parts of the country, according to local authorities in Indonesia's East Nusa Tenggara." (DPA 5 June 2002)

"East Timorese who fled their homeland in 1999 will lose their refugee status on December 31, said UN High Commissioner for Refugees Ruud Lubbers on Saturday. He cited the more than 207,000 returnees as a sign that the situation has returned to normal in the troubled territory.

Lubbers, who is in Dili to participate in the East Timor's independence ceremony on May 20, made the announcement after meeting East Timor's president-elect, Xanana Gusmao.

An estimated 260,000 people fled East Timor amidst a wave of violence following the August 1999 referendum that saw voters overwhelmingly support the territory's independence. The violence lasted several weeks, leaving many people dead and the infrastructure in ruins. Militia groups uprooted entire communities and forced them into neighbouring Indonesian territory while others fled into the mountains to escape the violence.

More than 207,000 East Timorese refugees have returned, mainly from camps in neighbouring Indonesian West Timor, since UNHCR began helping refugees homewards beginning in October 1999. In recent days, up to 500 refugees have been returning daily, with more than 3,000 people back so far this month. Some 50,000 refugees still remain outside their homeland."(UNHCR 18 May 2002)

PROPERTY ISSUES

General

Most IDPs who fled violence in Central Sulawesi lost property certificates and other legal documents (2004)

- Many of the estimated 124,000 people who were forced to flee their homes during the Poso conflict lost certificates and legal documents.
- Many properties were illegally seized in the absence of the owners while some IDPs had to sell their homes/lands at a fraction of their original value.
- Without the proper legal ownership documents, it is difficult to resolve land disputes.
- One of the root cause of the conflict has been land rights.

"The conflict in Poso District displaced over 124,000 people. Most of those displaced were forced to leave their homes in a rush often carrying nothing more than the clothes they were wearing. Most of the IDPs lost certificates and other legal documents that had provided them with access to credit and legal titles. Many of the IDPs had taken credit on their property and after being displaced they defaulted on their loans. In many cases the land title is unclear. The land certification process is cumbersome and is too often not undertaken by the poor for reasons of cost and awareness.

During the conflict, at the time of greatest displacement, often people on the opposite side in the conflict illegally seized the property of those displaced. In addition, forest and communal land were encroached upon, leading to land disputes. Some IDPs managed to sell their property but in most cases for a mere fraction of the market price. In extreme cases some families lost 90% of the original value of the land. The loss of legal ownership documents made it difficult to resolve local land claim disputes and this has the potential to generate new rounds of violence. Often these disputes are exploited by more radical elements of society.

It is important to note that while the conflict in Poso has manifested itself through inter-communal violence, one of the root causes of the conflict is land rights. Protecting legal entitlements to land and acknowledging indigenous land claims are essential steps if peace in Poso is to be sustained." (OCHA 9 April 2004, p. 66)

Issues of property restitution in Maluku province need to be addressed (October 2003)

- Emergency status lifted in September 2003.
- The housing problem remains unresolved for an officially estimated 63,971 families, or 332,548 people with scores of families are still occupying buildings and shops.
- Only a fraction of new homes have been built by the government compared to the number of refugees.
- Government is providing financial aid for families to build their own homes.
- IDPs are being asked to leave all government facilities, and problems related to the occupation of buildings and homes are likely to arise in a matter of time.

- Lawyers are particularly concerned with the possibility of property disputes when more people return to their homes

"Whether and when the state of civil emergency was lifted in Maluku was not really of any great importance to many residents.

The final lifting of the emergency status on Sept. 5. was merely official recognition that residents have long been capable of being in charge of their own safety.

Trust in each other has taken root again, though not to the point that Muslims and Christians again want to live among each other ("Maybe in 10, 20 years," says one refugee).

With returned confidence of being able to cross the lines which earlier defined life and death, even well after dark, people shrug off questions about how things are different now than they were under the emergency status.

Earlier this year people were already grateful that they could use land transportation instead of the more expensive speedboats to reach "Muslim" or "Christian" areas.

Now they are more concerned about how the government is taking care of the provision of basic needs.

The housing problem remains unresolved for an officially estimated 63,971 families, or 332,548 people. The capital houses refugees from other areas affected by the war which broke out in 1999 -- and Ambon residents themselves have moved from one area to another within the city.

Scores of families are still occupying buildings and shops, the interiors divided up by planks to separate families. Lawyers and journalists are among those spending their fourth year returning from work to cramped quarters and neighbors' screaming babies.

Only a fraction of new homes have been built by the government compared to the number of refugees -- and many of them have remained empty.

Therefore a new scheme was introduced; the provision of financial aid for families to build their own homes.

Since homes often accommodate up to five families under one roof, the 21-square-meter studio homes built by the government were far from appealing. Moreover, only a few refugees trusted authorities' claims that their home villages or neighborhoods were safe enough for them to return.

For thousands of families, it's a long wait to get the promised aid of a few million rupiah (the amount differs according to location) to help them rebuild their homes.

The priority is for refugees outside Ambon, and those whose neighbors in their home villages have said are welcome to return. This confirmation of welcome is crucial because "neighbors" often means those of the same religion as people who attacked the villages, though the attackers may have come from outside the area.

Given this slow development, victims have sought their own solutions -- and part of these efforts could become new sources of conflict.

Refugees recall how they escaped fires only with the clothes on their backs -- but eventually some were able to gather enough money to buy abandoned homes.

In a number of neighborhoods such as Batumerah in Ambon, Muslims asked neighbors to buy or sell homes for them.

Problems may arise in the cases of those who have not sold their homes, which have been occupied by others since the buildings were abandoned. This is apart from the refugees living in stores whose owners seem to have no choice but let them live there for free, rather than face resistance from a dozen families or so in each of the three to four-story buildings. And also scores of families living in the Army's dormitory in Tantui district -- leaving soldiers to seek shelter elsewhere, including in shop-houses.

The Army has already asked the refugees to leave, only to get the stubborn, standard answer: "Find us a home first."

Refugees are being asked to leave all government facilities, and other problems related to the occupation of buildings and homes are likely to arise in a matter of time.

Lawyers at the new Baku Bae Legal Aid Office are particularly concerned with the possibility of property disputes. "This will be a new source of conflict," says its director, Anthoni Hutane.

At the moment, occupying empty homes and buildings seems to be the only choice in the long wait for assistance. But sooner or later an increased feeling of safety might lead to more people returning to their homes -- and squabbles with the occupants.

As in a number of cases, the owner should expect to pay a "guarding fee" to persuade the occupant to leave, amounting to several million rupiah for guarding the house for a number of years.

Hutane's office is preparing an inventory of land ownership in case of disputing land claims.

These, then, are some of the issues feared to divide people again in the future. For now, there are several encouraging signs of a community coming together again, as reflected in the vegetable and fish markets, and on the sports grounds where aspiring soccer players practice. No cooperation between Aceh and North Sumatra authorities to protect IDP property (April 2003)

- Most IDPs in North Sumatra would like to return and repossess their property
- Protection of IDP property has not been discussed between source and recipient authorities

"Most IDPs would like to return to their place of origin, repossess their property but security remains the only impediment for their return. Some IDPs are reluctant and expressed that they will never return due to same security reason and past bitter memory. The second group is much comfortable in their current place of displacement.

There has been no official communication between provincial authorities of Aceh (IDPs originated from) and N. Sumatra (hosting IDPs) in regard to mutual solution to the problem. Protection of the IDPs properties, repossession rights and/or compensation are important factors should be discussed at the provincial level to establish working relationship in finding durable solution." (OCHA April 2003)

Over 55,000 homes destroyed throughout Indonesia since 1999 (June 2001)

- More than 55,000 homes destroyed throughout Indonesia since 1999 according to Government statistics.

- Maluku provinces worst hit with 35,968 buildings destroyed.
- 12,275 buildings destroyed in Aceh.

"More than 55,000 homes have been destroyed in the communal unrest wracking parts of Indonesia since 1999, Antara news agency said Saturday quoting government statistics.

Of 57,088 buildings razed during the violence, 448 had been houses of worship, 241 schools and 260 offices, the report said.

The Ministry of Resettlement and Regional Infrastructure figures showed that the worst hit areas were the North Maluku and Maluku islands, where the dragging Muslim-Christian conflict destroyed 35,968 buildings.

Violence associated with the separatist conflict in Aceh province left 12,275 buildings destroyed while most of the others were razed in conflicts in Central and West Kalimantan and Central Sulawesi, the report said." (The Jakarta Post 17 June 2001)

PATTERNS OF RETURN AND RESETTLEMENT

General

Land and property issues as well as more accurate information on available options remain to be addressed (2004)

- Despite the adoption of the GPID as a non-binding basis for the government's IDP strategy and policy, the following rights call for special attention in 2004:
- right to accurate and consistent information, especially on available options for durable solutions and types and contents of assistance packages;
- right to citizenship and identity papers;
- right to land/property ownership.

"Although the GPID have been unanimously accepted and serve as a non-binding basis for the government's strategy and policy to address IDP issues, continuous efforts are required to protect the following rights:

right to accurate and consistent information, especially on available options for durable solutions and types and contents of assistance packages;
right to citizenship and identity papers;
right to land/property ownership.

At the Follow-up Workshop on the Management of IDPs in June 2003, the suggestion was made to establish a special committee to deal with land ownership and certification and the recovery of abandoned or surrendered property. If and once established, the committee would be expected to accelerate the return process, as lack of action on this issue has been one of the major disincentives for IDPs to return. Participating departments, donors, UN agencies and NGOs confirmed their commitment to protect IDP rights and to the GPID, which is important given the GoRI's stand that IDPs need to find durable solutions by the end of 2003 and will no longer be considered as internally displaced in 2004.

Challenges for the protection of all conflict-affected persons remain, as human rights violations such as torture, sexual abuses, murder, and limited or denied access to humanitarian assistance continue to be reported in parts of the country." (OCHA 9 April 2004, pp. 7-8)

Maluku IDPs

Many new dwellings in Maluku remain empty due to lack of facilities (April 2004)

- Many of the 35,000 new houses built in Ambon and nearby islands remain reportedly empty because of their small size and lack of facilities.

"According to authorities in charge, up to now about 35 thousand new houses have been built for refugees in Ambon and nearby islands. However, apparently many of these remain vacant, because they are very small and lack facilities like water and electricity. Public facilities are not available either. So a number of refugees have returned to their refugee sites, where they enjoy the luxury of these amenities.

In many cases the government leaves it to the refugees themselves to build their houses, providing for each family a maximum of 10 million rupiahs (± EUR 980,-). However, not seldom the temptation to spend this “unbelievable” amount of money on luxury goods is too strong... That is why they usually receive part of their share in natura : cement, wood, etc. But these materials, too, not seldom are sold to others...” (CCDA 25 April 2004)

Despite Government's optimism and some returns, many remain displaced (2004)

- Government plans to return all Maluku IDPs by the end of 2003 as the security situation has reportedly improved.
- Central government had allocated 100 billion rupiah (11.2 million dollars) in 2003 to finance the construction of houses for the returnees, as well as hundreds of billions of rupiah for the setting up of social facilities in the province.

"Though limited, the return and resettlement/relocation of IDPs have started to areas where the GoRI has provided housing or to other areas where individuals are welcomed. However, according to GoRI's figures, 202,783 persons are still displaced, most of whom live in IDP camp sites, temporary housing provided by the authorities, with friends and relatives, or in abandoned private company premises in and outside of Ambon City. Also, some IDPs who took refuge in East Java and North Sulawesi, South East Sulawesi, North Maluku and Papua are still waiting to return to Maluku." (OCHA 9 April 2004, p. 18)

"The Indonesian government plans to return hundreds of thousands of people displaced by sectarian fighting in the Maluku islands to their homes this year, a senior minister said Tuesday.

'I am optimistic that the issue on the displaced Maluku people will be settled by the end of 2003,' coordinating minister for people's welfare Yusuf Kalla said while visiting Ambon, the capital of Maluku province, 2,338 kilometres northeast of Jakarta.

Kalla said the return of displaced people was now possible as the security situation had improved in Maluku, where clashes between Christian and Moslem communities claimed some 6,000 lives between 1999 to 2002.

Past government efforts to return to Ambon hundreds of thousands of civilians who fled the communal violence have run into problems due to fears of persecution and lack of government funding, the minister said.

'However, the situation at present has improved,' Kalla told the state-run Antara news agency.

He said he central government had allocated 100 billion rupiah (11.2 million dollars) in 2003 to finance the construction of houses for the returnees, as well as hundreds of billions of rupiah for the setting up of social facilities in the province." (DPA 29 April 2003)

Security, limited funding and land ownership disputes constrain return & resettlement of IDPs in Maluku province (2004)

- Constraints to return & resettlement include security, destroyed houses, land ownership disputes, obtainment of land, lack of job opportunities at relocation sites, discontent of the size of the houses provided and lack of information on possible option for IDPs.
- Deadline for implementation of the National Policies on Handling of IDPs/Refugees in Indonesia issued in October 2001 has been extended to the end of June 2003 and is likely to be extended again.
- Limited funding is also constraining return.

"Impediments to the return of the remaining IDPs are identified as follows: 1) security, especially for minority groups in religiously mixed villages/locations; 2) property/land disputes; 3) inadequate social services and economic opportunities at return/resettlement sites; 4) limited local capacity particularly in data collection and information dissemination; and 5) insufficient funding for provision of assistance. Though the security situation has improved in Ambon City, it is feared that many of the IDPs there may not be able to return to their places of origin within the city, as it is still deeply divided and property disputes remain." (OCHA 9 April 2004, p. 18)

"Main constraints for return and resettlement/relocation have been identified as follows:

Security: Some IDPs maintain contacts with the former neighbours in the villages of origin, but do not feel comfortable to permanently return. Some expressed concerns that people outside the village of origin may come in and displace them again.

Destroyed or occupied houses

Land ownership disputes: Some IDPs have certificates for their land, but others don't. The land of IDPs has often been occupied by IDPs from different villages, which further complicates the matter. So far, the Government has not done much to mediate the cases.

Identification and obtainment of land: If IDPs wish to be relocated, it is IDPs' responsibility to obtain land at their own cost. Then, the provincial government will build houses for them on the location. Often cases, IDPs do not have enough funds to buy land.

Lack of job opportunities at relocation sites: For those IDPs who work as labourers at harbours in Ambon city, incentives to be relocated far away from the city would be very low. Not all IDPs have experience in farming/agriculture. On this point, the Government has been mapping IDPs' occupations and seeking possibilities of providing vocational training if necessary.

Discontent with the size of provided houses: Dinas PU provides one type of house T21. The house is too small for IDPs as two to three families used to live together in one house. Some IDPs are not aware of the size of the house they are getting, though they agree to be relocated. (NB: Dinas Social provides housing materials and Dinas Nakertrans also provides housing materials but only partially).

Lack of clear information on possible options for IDPs: Some IDPs heard that others received empowerment/termination funds already, which is not the case. It appears that IDP coordinators individually contact various Governmental units to register their concerns, but their concerns/claims have not gone through the right channel.

Though the deadline for implementation of the National Policies on Handling of IDPs/Refugees in Indonesia issued in October 2001 has been extended to the end of June 2003, OCHA learned that the Provincial Government has requested further extension, as they could only find solutions for 3 districts: West South East Maluku, South East Maluku and Buru within the given timeframe. The Government identified the following constraint in addition to the above:

Limited funding: There are IDPs from Maluku in South East Sulawesi, East Java and North Sulawesi waiting to be returned. Though transportation will be handled by the Provinces of refuge, other support costs have to be provided by the Province of origin, Maluku province." (Bakornas & OCHA April 2003, pp. 2-3)

North Maluku IDPs

Main focus in North Maluku is on return, funds lacking (May 2004)

- Media report that there are still some 28,000 IDPs spread over North Maluku.
- The main reason why they don't return is the lack of funds to rebuild their homes.
- Assistance provided in North Maluku has enabled many to return.
- However, the community-level reconciliation remains fragile in many areas and land disputes are rife.
- As of October 2003, JRS reports that many people, estimated at 5,000 individuals, remained displaced in camps in Ambon and their return to North Maluku delayed

"The commercial SCTV television newsbulletin (Liputan6.com) reports that – though already three years have passed since the unrest in the North Moluccas came to an end – there are still at least some 28,000 refugees spread over North Celebes, the Moluccas, Ternate etc.

Their current situation in many cases is deplorable. The principal reason they are still staying on as refugees or IDPs is lack of funds for their return and rebuilding their homes. Governor Thaib Armaiyn of the North Moluccas province, says that to this end he needs at least 70 billion rupiahs (about EUR 6.730.000,-). Most refugees say they want to go back as soon as possible, but – they say – they have the impression that the government does not care." (CCDA 21 May 2004)

"The return process has included an increased number of ethnic minorities returning to religiously mixed communities (e.g. Muslims to Tobelo and Christians to Ternate), although major sources of concern are the uneven and fragile community-level reconciliation, and the remaining potential for land/property disputes. Assistance activities carried out by national and international actors in rehabilitating damaged infrastructure, agriculture and re-establishing provision of services have contributed to the creation of an enabling environment for IDPs to return to their communities. FAO has been supporting IDPs and the livelihood recovery of fishing and farming communities in North Maluku through the provision of basic agriculture inputs, post-harvest equipment and fishing gear as well as training in income-generating activities.

Positive developments have also occurred in terms of the administration of the province of North Maluku, gradually contributing to enhanced confidence in stability and security in the region. The smooth implementation of the establishment of new districts and sub-districts, as stipulated by the Government Regulation No. 1 Year 2003, and the lifting of the Civil Emergency Status in North Maluku on 18 May 2003 as per the Government Regulation No. 27 Year 2003, to name a few, are indications of a continued move towards normality." (OCHA 9 April 2004, p. 20)

"The schedule for returning home for the displaced people of northern Moluccas (Indonesia) remains merely a plan without a clear timetable for its completion, writes JRS Moluccas. Indeed, the return home is long overdue: the original plan had the displaced community returning by 20 August 2003, but the camps in Ambon, housing those displaced from northern Moluccas are still full, without any explanation as to why the return has been delayed. This community of around 1,000 families, or 5,000 individuals, has been displaced for almost four years. In a recent meeting with JRS, the Second Assistant to the Governor of the Moluccan Province, Jafar Soamole, stated that the delay was due to an un-readiness on the part of the North Moluccas Province to receive back the displaced people. This may be due in part to the fact that the North Moluccan government is also at the present moment facilitating the return home of displaced people from North Sulawesi, and the indications are that when this movement is complete the returnees who are now located in Ambon will then follow. Meanwhile in the camps in Ambon the displaced people have been ready to return for some time. With the earlier expectation that the return was imminent the displaced communities sold most of their possessions - unaware that delays lay ahead. JRS is accompanying members of this community, providing them with services and assisting them in their efforts to return home." (JRS 15 October 2003)

"A remaining 1,900 families continue to be displaced in North Maluku, 2,600 families in North Sulawesi (not including those that have received a "Termination Fund") and around 1,100 families fled to Maluku Province. In addition, 329 families of IDPs from Maluku Province fled to North Maluku. The main focus on returns has been rural displacements and IDPs in Ternate (capital city) to Tobelo; and those displaced in Tobelo to their original communities especially Ternate. At this time around 70% of those displaced from Tobelo have returned. Of those who have returned spontaneously to Galela, Obi and Bacan the greater part are civil servants (including teachers). There are still some 4,400 remaining IDP families in Ternate. Assistance for remaining IDPs in North Sulawesi will be provided but costs of repatriation are yet to be settled between the authorities of the two provinces. But there have also been setbacks, such as the clashes in Morotai, causing IDPs to return to their displacement sites in Tobelo.

As in Maluku there is a problem with eligibility criteria for IDPs and instances of abuse by those inappropriately claiming assistance either by not meeting basic criteria or re-registering. Following more thorough checks of actual displacement it was found that there were very few remaining IDPs, eligible for assistance. Data and bona fides must be verified to the level of the village." (Bakornas PBP & OCHA July 2003, p.14)

Aceh IDPs

Many IDPs return only to find their homes destroyed and property stolen (December 2003)

- IDPs in Bireuen regency returning home after staying in a camp found that many of their belongings had been stolen and their homes seized.
- Owners of food and coffee kiosks have lost their stocks while many peasants have lost their livestock or crops while being away from their homes and lands

"In Bireuen regency, the refugees camped at Cot Gapu had lost all their belongings after they fled, as was reported by Serambi. The sufferings these residents of Juli district experienced while in the camp at Cot Gapu have not ended although they were returned to their villages a week ago. Many have become poverty-stricken because their homes and stores have been seized. The security forces say they have not yet received a report on this case of theft that has ruined so many villagers. Because of the seizures the homeowners say they have lost televisions, fridges, tape recorders, bicycles and other household goods.

The same fate has been experienced by the owners of food and coffee kiosks. They've lost stock like cigarettes, snacks, clothes and medicines. They don't know who has taken these things, and they hope the government will enforce the law. As well as the losses in goods and household items, there are not a few who have lost livestock, homes and shops are destroyed, and thousands of hectares of rice-paddy has dried out because the irrigation was not maintained for nearly a month. This was reported by a number of residents of Juli Kedue Dua and Setuy. The keuchik - village head –of Juli Keude Dua added that he lost a 29-inch TV and Phoenix-brand bicycle." (KONTRAS 11 December 2003)

IDPs return home from the biggest IDP camp in Aceh (July 2003)

- Thousands of displaced people accommodated in the biggest IDP camp near Bireun have returned home, according to the military

"Thousands of villagers crammed into the biggest refugee camp in Indonesia's war-torn Aceh have gone home but nearly 38,000 are still holed up elsewhere in the province, the military said on Sunday.

At one stage more than 16,000 villagers were living in tents in a football field in Bireun, a town near some of the worst fighting since government troops launched a fresh offensive to crush rebels of the Free Aceh Movement (GAM) on May 19.

Aceh military spokesman Colonel Ditya Sudarsono said those in Bireun had gone home in phases, with the last refugees leaving on Saturday. Most arrived in mid-June.

"Those left in Bireun departed yesterday, around the Bireun area all have gone back to their homes," Sudarsono said by telephone from the provincial capital Banda Aceh.

He put the total refugees in other parts of Aceh at 37,600.

Some of the refugees in Bireun had fled fighting while government troops had forced many others to leave their homes so they could sweep the area for rebels.

The military has said it would put villagers in camps so troops could move through the unoccupied areas to root out GAM fighters. Bireun lies 170 km (105 miles) east of Banda " (Reuters 20 July 2003)

Return of IDPs from North Sumatra to Aceh is not a realistic option, empowerment is preferred (June 2003)

- Return to Aceh is not feasible given the current military operation underway there and empowerment is seen as a preferable option given also the fact that many IDPs have since settled in host areas.
- Provincial Government indicate that there are 15,277 IDP families of whom 5,546 families/ 22,184 persons have the right to receive assistance.
- If the verification can be quickly solved the Provincial Government is confident that the IDP problem can be resolved by end 2003.
- Verification of IDP numbers and transfer of termination funds should be finished by May.
- IDP status is revoked upon reception of the termination funds, but right to return or be relocated remains.
- Provision of termination fund appears to be the only IDP plan.
- Most IDPs would like to return but security conditions are not conducive.

- No official communication and cooperation between Aceh authorities and North Sumatra to resolve the issue.
- "Termination fund" policy issued in July 2002 by the government to put an end to the IDP problem.

"As return is not considered a realistic option at this time, and IDP communities have since settled into their host areas, empowerment is the appropriate policy response. At present, no other province is accepting the relocation of IDPs. Most IDPs started to arrive in 1998 and then many more followed in 1999. Previously 24,747 IDP families were recorded from Aceh, this then, after district verification, declined to 22,320 families. The Provincial Government verifications indicate that there are 15,277 IDP families of whom 5,546 families/ 22,184 persons have the right to receive assistance. Another 2,000 families, who are claiming the IDP status, require further verification while a total of 12,000 families have already received the termination grant.

As in other places the Government is concerned over frequent fraudulent claims and in one particular case is taking legal action against the alleged offender. When 7,643 families had been paid, the Department of Social Affairs suspended assistance for another 3,000 families until their claims are properly verified. These families have demonstrated against the suspension. If the problem of verification and fraud can be quickly solved the Provincial Government is confident that the IDP problem can be resolved by year's end.

Given the current military operation in the province of Nanggroe Aceh Darussalam, the Provincial Government is also putting in place contingency arrangements for the possibility of new IDPs, but to date only 393 families have arrived, and these persons originated from North Sumatra. It is considered that Acehnese are afraid to cross the border into North Sumatra.

Another strain for North Sumatra is the repatriation of illegal Indonesian workers from neighbouring Malaysia." (Bakornas PBP & OCHA July 2003, p. 17)

"By May 2003, the provincial authorities are expected to complete verification of IDPs, transfer by bank accounts the remaining terminations funds to the remaining beneficiaries, and accordingly will request the Central Government for additional funding. Once a family receives termination fund, the provincial authorities no longer consider them as IDPs neither they qualify for further IDP assistance irrespective of the IDPs location of residence and their conditions. Providing funds do not revoke IDPs return rights to the place of origin or alternative settlement. The decision remains up to discretion of individual IDPs for their return, residence and security. The authorities do not have comprehensive plans to resolve the IDP issues other than termination grants provided by the government and nominal assistance from the NGOs.

Most IDPs would like to return to their place of origin, repossess their property but security remains the only impediment for their return. Some IDPs are reluctant and expressed that they will never return due to same security reason and past bitter memory. The second group is much comfortable in their current place of displacement.

There has been no official communication between provincial authorities of Aceh (IDPs originated from) and N. Sumatra (hosting IDPs) in regard to mutual solution to the problem. Protection of the IDPs properties, repossession rights and/or compensation are important factors should be discussed at the provincial level to establish working relationship in finding durable solution." (OCHA April 2003, pp. 2-3)

"In the middle of July 2002, the Indonesian government issued a policy providing a 'termination fund' to the IDPs. The idea was to disburse a certain amount of cash assistance (ranging from 8 million to ten million rupiah) to the IDPs so in turn they would be able to rebuild their lives and 'stop calling themselves IDPs.'

Without regard for the socio-economic and political factors underlying the IDP problem in Aceh and the ethnic politics exploited to the hilt by the parties to the conflict, the Indonesian government embarked on a de-facto denial of the IDP problem. A policy flawed from the start, the implementation of the termination fund was marred by corruption and incompetence so that it had to be 'terminated' and is at present being evaluated. Once more, the IDPs were caught in the middle. Desperate and frustrated at the helpless situation that surrounded them, a group of IDPs protested in front of the government office in North Sumatra last year, calling for a fairer implementation of the termination fund. The protest action however, did not help in improving public perception of IDPs as burdens to society. Their limited chance to express their views to the concerned entities was in vain. They are, as it was two years ago, made to wait again." (JRS 26 March 2002)

"The Local Government had considered the three Government programmes to handle the IDPs:

- Return to NAD. However, as the NAD security situation was not conducive, IDPs were not ready to be returned yet.
- Relocation by placing them on a transmigration programme. This option was also not found feasible.
- Local empowerment. In order to terminate the status of IDPs, the Government provides compensation fund of initially Rp 2,750,000 per family, which was increased to Rp 8,750,000 per family due to complaints from the IDPs that the first amount was too small. After receiving the fund, IDPs have to sign an agreement that states the termination of their IDP status and that they no longer depend on the Government. Before termination, IDPs received Rp 1,500 and 4 ons of rice/person/day." (UN 15 January 2003, p. 9)

2,500 IDPs escorted home by peace monitors (January 2003)

- Team of peace monitors has escorted 2,500 IDPs back home in North Aceh.
- Plan to escort an additional 2,000 more in East Aceh.

"A team of peace monitors has escorted more than 2,500 refugees back to their homes in the restive Indonesian province of Aceh, the Henry Dunant Center (HDC) said here Tuesday.

'The return of these refugees on Monday afternoon shows that the security mechanisms recently established by the joint security committee are working,' HDC representative and peace mediator David Gorman said in a statement.

The Geneva-based HDC has mediated talks between the Indonesian government and the separatist Free Aceh Movement (GAM) since 2000, culminating in the signing of a peace agreement on December 9. It is also part of the tripartite peace monitoring team which also includes government and GAM representatives.

Nine members of the tripartite joint security committee were involved in return of the refugees, who came from eight villages in North Aceh and had sought shelter at a mosque in Lhoksukon for nearly a month, he said.

The joint security committee is also planning to assist the return of some 2,000 more refugees currently in the Bagok area of East Aceh soon, Gorman said." (AFP 14 January 2003)

Sulawesi IDPs

2/3 of the IDPs in Central Sulawesi have returned but the security situation remains fragile (June 2003)

- The continuing precipitating factor preventing significant returns is security
- Very few Christians are prepared to return to Moslem-dominated areas, and very few Moslems are prepared to return to Christian-dominated communities.
- Following violence not all affected persons fled, thus reconstruction and service needs as well as the problems of trauma and lost livelihoods affect many more than those displaced.
- Lack of clear instructions from the Central Government as to available funding for reconstruction work, or which departments will take the lead
- Malino Declaration and deployment of security forces in late 2001 have led to the return of 107,000 IDPs out of an estimated 143,000.
- Fragility of the situation, continued mistrust between Christian and Muslim communities and lack of basic social services remain constraints to return.

"The continuing precipitating factor preventing significant returns is security. The uneasy peace settlement signed in South Sulawesi (Malino I) is punctuated with periodic criminal actions on both sides elongating tensions. It is still uncertain as to whether the present relative present calm is enduring because the community wants security, or due to the heavy presence of security forces. There are still automatic military weapons in the possession of some community members, and attacks by masked provocateurs are still common. The communities want the military to stay, while trying to activate their own security arrangements.

The Government has instituted a process of district fragmentation to alleviate the inter-communal rivalries over district leaders that many believe initially fed the violence. But, it is believed that this will not be a solution and may only intensify the divisions. Still, today, due to trauma, very few Christians are prepared to return to Moslem-dominated areas, and very few Moslems are prepared to return to Christian-dominated communities.

Although many remaining IDP families are yet to receive Government assistance, the scope of the problem is much wider. Following violence not all affected persons fled, thus reconstruction and service needs as well as the problems of trauma and lost livelihoods affect many more than those displaced. In Poso District, the Government's policy of returns, relocation and empowerment can only be achieved through greater security.

The different types of assistance provided by the Government are still a source for confusion. The various tiers of government and humanitarian organisations working in Central Sulawesi need to improve coordination, consistency and transparency of available assistance. If the security environment in Poso and surrounding areas can be strengthened then spontaneous or unassisted returns could be expected. But, significant support will be required for the reconstruction of services and infrastructure. Still, there are no clear instructions from the Central Government as to available funding for reconstruction work, or which departments will take the lead." (Bakornas PBP & OCHA July 2003, p. 19)

"In late December 2001, the GoRI initiated a peace process (led by Minister Kalla) bringing representatives of the Christian and Moslem communities to Malino town of south Sulawesi where a peace agreement called "Malino Declaration" was signed. This agreement indeed brought relative peace and generated hopes for a brighter future in Central Sulawesi. The peace process was strengthened by the deployment of large numbers of security forces to the area. The Malino Declaration coincided with the GoRI policy on handling IDPs which introduced three options to end IDP crisis: return, local empowerment, and transmigration. In Central Sulawesi the return option has proved to be more successful with continued support from the government at all levels. Thus far, out of 31,326 families (143,354 persons), a total of 25,790 families (107,283 persons) have returned to their places of origin, and have begun to resume their lives.

The mission found that the trend is positive and that the return process continues, although at a slower pace than expected. This is due to the fragility of the situation, mistrust that exist within communities, the fact that many IDPs have been displaced three or four times over the last two to three years, and lack of resources and basic social services." (Bakornas & OCHA March 2003, pp. 1-2)

"After the Malino accord, there was some tentative progress. By late February 10,000 displaced persons had returned home, mostly to Poso town, Poso Pesisir, Lage, and Tojo subdistricts. Human Rights Watch found that in March 2002 many families were tentatively sending home male family members to clean up the wreckage and build temporary housing, while waiting to see if the situation remained stable. Some were also waiting for the end of the school year. Since then the number of displaced persons has steadily, but slowly, fallen. The district social welfare agency reported that, as of mid-July 2002, 43,308 persons had returned home, roughly 40 percent of the estimated 110,227 displaced people.

There are two important exceptions to this positive trend. New violence often sends traumatized residents fleeing back to safe areas. For example, clashes in August 2002 forced some 1,200 to seek refuge in Tentena alone. Official or individual efforts to rebuild have been hurt by new rounds of violence throughout the crisis. Several people told Human Rights Watch they had seen their homes destroyed more than once, and the barracks built by the district government and TNI in 2000 were often targeted in attacks. Christians in Tentena also had no plans to dismantle their laboriously built shelters, in case they needed to seek refuge in the future.

The other important exception relates to displaced persons who are minorities in their home areas. Muslim displaced persons from Tentena told Human Rights Watch in Palu that they had no plans to go home, although a remnant of twenty-four Muslims had never left and reported the situation to be safe. Some displaced persons were given access to land in their new areas, such as the Nunu area of Palu, and were able to support themselves through agricultural activities. Christian displaced persons in Tentena built extensive housing and many were able to find work in the market town, which did well economically since travel to other markets was limited. In areas where land or jobs were scarce the conditions were much worse.

A local NGO reported in August 2002 that the basic needs of displaced persons were not being met, noting the poor nutritional status of children, as well as widespread diarrhea, skin infections, and tetanus from gunshot wounds. A 2001 government mental health assessment indicated that more than 55 percent of those displaced suffered from psychological troubles, while the main health problems were malaria, respiratory infections, gastric-intestinal problems, and skin diseases.

The U.N. Guiding Principles on Internal Displacement states that the government has "the primary duty and responsibility to establish conditions, as well as provide the means, which allow internally displaced persons to return voluntarily, in safety and with dignity, to their homes... or to resettle voluntarily in another part of the country." There is a continuing need for local and international NGOs and U.N. agencies to provide assistance in the voluntary return and rehabilitation of displaced persons. Leaders on both sides of the conflict noted the role of revenge attacks by displaced people in perpetuating the violence, so their voluntary return and reintegration is critical. Those displaced persons from areas in which they were a minority should not be pushed to return until they feel safe. Alternatively, the government can settle them in other areas." (HRW 4 December 2002, p. 39)

North Maluku and Central Sulawesi IDPs in North Sulawesi to be resettled (March 2001)

- 40,000 IDPs in North Sulawesi originating from North Maluku and Central Sulawesi are to be resettled across North Sulawesi according to their own wishes.
- Manado and Bitung town hosts the highest number of IDPs with respectively 16,800 and 12,120 IDPs.

"A massive resettlement project for some 40,000 refugees in North Sulawesi began this month in an attempt to help them get on their feet again.

'The refugees are those who have fled conflicts in Maluku and Central Sulawesi, both of which have claimed thousands of lives,' North Maluku Governor A.J. Sondakh said during a visit by foreign envoys and the Minister of Regional Infrastructure and Settlement Erna Witoelar last week.

'Based on polls held among the refugees, it turns out that they don't wish to go back to their hometowns. Therefore, we have decided to resettle them in several cities and regencies across North Sulawesi,' the governor said.

The latest data shows that the North Sulawesi capital of Manado hosts the largest number of internally displaced persons (IDP), with a total of 16,800, while Bitung town has 12,120, Minahasa regency 4,400, Bolaang Mongondow regency 1,175, Sangihe Talaud regency 3,800, Gorontalo regency and Gorontalo city 406 and 826 respectively and Bualemo regency 215.

'We have no choice but to put the resettlement project into effect as both the local and central governments can no longer provide sufficient funds to support the thousands of refugees here,' Minister Erna told The Jakarta Post.

'If we continue to provide aid, they will never get back on their feet,' she said.

The first scheme consists of the development of 500 houses in Pandu village, Mapanget district in Manado city which will be 75 percent completed this month. The complex is expected to house around 2,500 people and is due to be completed over the next few months.

The second phase will comprise the construction of housing developments on a 20-hectare plot in the city of Bitung, some 225 kilometers east of Manado and a four-hectare site in Tahuna town, Sangihe Talaud regency. [...]" (Jakarta Post 1 March 2001)

IDPs from East Timor

UNHCR plans to resettle East Timorese displaced on Sumba Island (January 2003)

- Pilot project to resettle former East Timorese refugees on the eastern Indonesian island of Sumba expected to begin early 2003.
- 28,000 East Timorese are estimated to remain in Indonesian West Timor

- As of January 1, the East Timorese are no longer considered refugees
- Of the 28,000 who remain in West Timor, many are former government employees, police or soldiers and their families.
- Those resettling in Sumba will receive household supplies, food for up to nine months, and UNHCR and Indonesian assistance in building their new houses

"A pilot project to resettle former East Timorese refugees on the eastern Indonesian island of Sumba is expected to begin early this year, UN refugee officials said Wednesday.

At least seven communities in western Sumba have expressed interest in receiving a small number of the estimated 28,000 East Timorese who remain in Indonesian West Timor, said Fernando Protti-Alvarado, the UN High Commissioner for Refugees (UNHCR) assistant regional representative.

As of January 1, the East Timorese are no longer considered refugees, meaning they do not get Indonesian or UNHCR assistance to return to their former homeland.

'We feel that in the short to longer-term it's better if the... caseload is resettled away from West Timor and away from the border to avoid potential problems in the future,' Robert Ashe, the UNHCR's regional representative, told reporters.

Protti-Alvarado, speaking at the same press conference, said because most of the 28,000 are expected to remain in Indonesia, the UNHCR is supporting efforts to resettle the East Timorese elsewhere in the archipelago.

The west Sumba village of Denduka has committed to taking 70 East Timorese families in the pilot project, Protti-Alvarado said.

About 300 local families, most of them Protestant, currently farm and raise cattle, he said.

As many as 300 Catholic East Timorese families, or about 1,500 people, could eventually be resettled in the west Sumba communities, Protti-Alvarado said.

'It's risky in terms that it has not been tested,' Protti-Alvarado acknowledged. 'The good thing is that we have government support in terms of trying to reduce the potential for conflict.'

Many West Timorese became fed up with the lengthy presence of East Timorese, blaming the outsiders for violence and theft. Jealousy also arose as refugees were given continued assistance.

About 250,000 East Timorese fled or were forced across the border in late 1999 during an orgy of murder, arson, looting and destruction by Indonesian security forces and the militias they created, in retaliation for East Timor's vote for independence.

Of the 28,000 who remain in West Timor, many are former government employees, police or soldiers and their families.

Those who choose to resettle in Sumba will receive household supplies, food for up to nine months, and UNHCR and Indonesian assistance in building their new houses, Protti-Alvarado said.

The host community itself will also receive funding based on the number of families it accepts, he said." (AFP 15 January 2003)

IDPs from Central Kalimantan

Return to Central Kalimantan is still problematic (June 2003)

- Of the over 93,000 persons that fled to East Java Province in the wake of the violence 43,400 have been assisted in finding durable solutions to their displacement.
- In the districts affected by severe violence returns have not occurred
- 98% of the IDPs wish to return to Kalimantan, but people of Kalimantan are not yet ready to welcome their return.
- IDPs from Central Kalimantan are awaiting government decisions, and the passing of regulations in Central Kalimantan to guarantee safety and security.
- Employment possibilities for the IDPs on Madura island are scarce.
- Return movements to Barito Utara, Barito Selatan, Kotawaringin Barat (Central Kalimantan) started end of 2002
- Return of IDPs to Palangkaraya City, Kotawaringin Timur (Sampit) and Kapuas, in Central Kalimantan, has not been permitted so far

"Of the over 93,000 persons that fled to East Java Province in the wake of the violence 43,400 have been assisted in finding durable solutions to their displacement. Most returns have been spontaneous to the 3 districts, where violence was limited to intermittent skirmishes; in the districts affected by severe violence returns have not occurred and the general feeling of the resident community is that the "time is not ready" to receive large numbers of the IDPs that fled. " (Bakornas PBP & OCHA July 2003, p. 16)

"General

The provincial and district governments have stated that 98% of the IDPs wish to return to Kalimantan, however, it seems that for the moment the people of Kalimantan are not yet ready to welcome their return.

The IDPs in Madura Island have remained in Madura for this period of time, without moving to East Java mainland because they do not have family in East Java. Also, East Java itself is already overpopulated with 35,500,000 people, in a Province that can accommodate 22 million people. If a programme was to begin for the movement of the Madurese to bigger cities in East Java, including Surabaya, urban infrastructure and security must be reinforced, which is unlikely to happen.

The majority of IDPs wish to return to Central Kalimantan, and are very optimistic of this possibility. They are awaiting government decisions, and the passing of regulations in Central Kalimantan (Peraturan Daerah - provincial, and Peraturan Penduduk – district) to guarantee safety and security when returning.

Employment possibilities for the IDPs on Madura island are scarce, and employment in Surabaya is not an easy option, given the slow ferry connection. (Construction of a bridge connecting Madura Island to Surabaya will begin mid-2003 and is not due to be completed until 2006).

The two main districts with high concentration of IDPs are Sampang and Bangkalan.

i) Temporary Resettlement Locations

The Office of Manpower and Transmigration (Nakertrans) has provided temporary resettlement houses in remote areas in Sampang (Desa Nyeloh) and Bangkalan (Sepulu). Transportation to reach the resettlement locations is problematic, and jobs are scarce.

ii) IDP Camps/ Barracks

Nakertrans, as well as private companies (SCTV, Gulf, Petromina) have built IDP camps/ sites in Ketapang, Sampang and Desa Kelubung and Kecamatan Sepulu in Bangkalan.

iii) Insertion/ Integration into homes of host families/ relatives (sisipan)

The Office of Regional Infrastructure and Resettlement (Kimpraswil) has assisted host families by providing extensions and repairs to homes to accommodate the extra families that are living in the areas.

vi) Return

There have been efforts of return to Central Kalimantan. 107 families (540 people) have already returned from Sampang, Pamengkasan, and Bangkalan to 3 areas in Central Kalimantan (Barito Utara, Barito Selatan, Kotawaringin Barat). The returns started end of 2002. The three remaining areas for return in Central Kalimantan are Palangkaraya City, Kotawaringin Timur (Sampit) and Kapuas, these three districts in Central Kalimantan have not permitted the return of IDPs yet, however the Peraturan Daerah and Peraturan Penduduk is in process." (OCHA February 2003, pp. 3-5)

Main problems and recommendations from the OCHA mission (February 2003)

- Problem of accuracy on IDP number and movements
- Those who have returned to Central Kalimantan have not been carefully monitored

"VI. Main Problems

Data collecting – for accurate numbers and movements.

Information flow and socialisation of new developments and new information at the grass-root level, and at the top-level from both sides. There are two main independent communication forums set up by the IDPs themselves to represent the IDPs in Sampang (FK4 – Forum Komunikasi Korban Kerusuhan Kalimantan) and FKPB for Bangkalan (Forum Komunikasi Pengungsi Bangkalan). These two groups work together, and with the government to ensure solutions and the socialisation of decisions made, and information to the IDPs.

Those who have returned have not been carefully monitored as the IDPs who have returned are reluctant to report to local governments in Central Kalimantan in case of trouble. If they were to report, the Office of Social Affairs (Dinsos) in Central Kalimantan will provide them with food assistance and living costs for the first few months, and return transport costs.

VII. Efforts/ Next Steps and Recommendations

Go and See and Come and Tell visits planned for March

Reconciliation efforts made by international organisations (Common Ground, others?)

Socialisation at grass-root-level of conditions and socialisation of the Peraturan Daerah and the Peraturan Penduduk at the grass-root level with community leaders in Kalimantan and religious leaders from Madura.

Conditioning of Central Kalimantan Provincial Government to receive the return of the Madurese to Kalimantan.

Socialisation of the Guiding Principles on IDPs." (OCHA February 2003, p. 5)

IDPs from West Kalimantan

IDPs in camps in Pontianak refuse to be relocated before relocation areas are improved (October 2002)

- Deplorable water & sanitation conditions in IDP camps in Pontianak.
- IDPs do not want to move to relocation areas because of the reported difficult conditions on these sites.
- 13,000 Madurese IDP waiting to be relocated in and around Pontianak.
- Gov. says no improvements will be made until IDPs move to the relocation camps.
- IDPs are offered 3 options: local integration (with $500 as compensation), return or resettlement in other areas (with $250) or return to area of origin with out any specified compensation

"Most of the IDP camps are in deplorable conditions with bad water and sanitation. The camps in Pontianak also face hostility from the primarily Dayak and Malay population, who oppose extended stays in the IDP camps.

The IDPs in Pontianak fall into four categories: those who want to relocate to another camp, those who do not want to relocate, those who are undecided, and those who want to return to Sambas. Many have heard from other IDPs who have moved to relocation areas how difficult these sites are and will not move until they know the relocation sites are improved.

More than 13,000 Madurese IDPs countrywide are currently waiting to be relocated in and around Pontianak. They want assurance that the relocation areas will provide security; formal education for their children; potable water, sanitation, electricity; health facilities, and other public facilities (mosques), as well as economic opportunities to support themselves. Ultimately, they want the option of returning to their original homes in Sambas, north of Pontianak, in the future. The government of Indonesia, however, says that no improvements will be made to the relocation sites until the IDPs move to them.

This policy leaves the IDPs living in deplorable conditions in the camps. In addition, as a result of government decentralization, the government of Indonesia has left many of the provincial areas in a state of confusion about their roles and responsibilities.

The government of Indonesia has developed a policy that will reduce the number of IDPs in camps from 1.3 million to zero by the end of 2002. Implementation of this plan involved giving IDPs three options: locally integration with 5 million rupiah ($500) as compensation, or return or resettle in different areas with 2.5 million rupiah ($250) as compensation, or return to their place of origin with unspecified compensation.

Addressing the root causes of displacement is the only long-lasting solution to the plight of IDPs in Indonesia. This is one of the reasons the three-option plan of the Government of Indonesia will take much longer to implement." (OCHA 22 October 2002)

For more information on the relocation process in West Kalimantan, see:

"Best Practice of UN-OCHA and NGOs' Cooperation: A Case Study of UN-OCHA Indonesia Office", by Micheal Elmquist, Deputy to the Humanitarian Coordinator and Chief, UN-OCHA Indonesia, Presentation given at a Regional Workshop on Networking and Collaboration among NGOs of Asian Countries in Disaster Reduction and Response, 20-22 February 2002.

Regional government has indicated that the strategy opted is the resettlement programme (February 2003)

- West Kalimantan regional government has opted for resettlement as the main strategy for the solving the IDP problem.

"In West Kalimantan, the regional government has indicated that the strategy opted is the resettlement programme. Various NGOs have agreed that the course of action decided by the GoRI for West Kalimantan is a possible temporary solution to the IDP situation. It should be admitted that the GoRI, especially at regional levels, has limited capacity in dealing with large-scale complex humanitarian crisis.

NGOs believe that the strategy for West Kalimantan can succeed only if there is a willingness and collective efforts from GoRI, local government, local and international NGOs, the IDPs, local communities, and other stakeholders to find and to work together on the best solution, and to resolve the situation.

The GoRI has established a number of relocation areas to which IDPs may move. The GoRI has also given the IDPs resources, such as land, housing and food assistance, to build their lives again at the new locations." (UNOCHA 14 February 2003, p. 117)

HUMANITARIAN ACCESS

Maluku

While tension is easing, international staff remain out of Ambon (June 2004)

- In June, 2 months after the violence that killed 40 people and displaced an estimated 10,000, the situation in Ambon was relatively calm.
- Dividing lines between Muslim and Christians are fading away gradually and national staff of UN agencies have returned to Ambon.
- International staff still keep out of Ambon for security reasons.

"The recent spate of bombings and reports of new arms caches found in Ambon is a strong reminder to both the authorities and the people of Maluku that enduring peace cannot be taken for granted. The latest incidents make it all too clear that elements with an interest in seeing the peace disrupted are still at work for either financial or political gain. The situation in Ambon during this month was relatively calm, however, although local media reported several incidents of bombs and explosives being discovered. The city's dividing lines (non-visible) between Muslim and Christian communities are slowly fading away and tension is easing, while people appear to be more interested to return back to normalcy yet afraid of attacks from the opponent group. On a positive note, some journalists from Maluku made a four points declaration; a) Support peace and reconciliation process, b) Publish positive news and avoid provocative statements, c) Apply professional attitude and d) Urge the government and security apparatus to solve separatist movement.

After careful review of the security situation, national staff members (Ambon residents) of the UN agencies have returned back to the Island however, international staff are to remain out of Ambon at least until the 5 July election for security reasons." (OCHA 30 June 2004)

"A team of UN Field Security Unit (FSU), Jakarta is visiting Ambon since 27 May 2004, to evaluate the situation particularly for a possible return of UN staff and resumption of activities. The visiting FSU team recommended the return of 68 UN staff and their immediate family members relocated in Jakarta since the end of April. Staff members are expected to return by first week of June. Office equipment, records and belongings of OCHA, UNICEF, WHO, UNDP, and UNSECOORD accommodated in the UN Project Coordination Office (UNPCO) have been destroyed at the onset of the recent conflict. Therefore, full and immediate resumption of UN activities will be difficult and staff may face additional difficulties to access the divided communities. MSF-B remained in the city throughout the troubled period while other INGOs, namely SC-UK, CARDI, JRS, ICMC, IMC and Mercy Corps, relocated their staff temporarily but have now resumed their activities in the province." (OCHA 1 June 2004)

Situation has improved in the province but tension remains in Ambon (April 2003)

- Situation has stabilized in the province but remains tense in Ambon.
- Violence in Ambon continued in April and May 2002.
- End-May a special operations military command for Maluku was formed in an effort to curb the violence. HR activists claim it amounts to declaring martial law.

- International NGOs and UN agencies active in the province took the precaution of evacuating most of their international staff during the April violences.

"Over the last two years, the situation has become more stable and conducive to finding durable solutions for IDPs, though the security situation especially in Ambon city remains tense. Though limited, the return and the resettlement/relocation of IDPs have started to the areas where the Government has provided housing or to other areas where individuals are welcome." (Bakornas & OCHA April 2003, p. 1)

"The violence that plagued Ambon in April continued into the month of May. The most recent violence in Ambon was in reaction to the arrest of Jaffar Umar Thalib, head of Laskar Jihad, on May 4 in Surabaya as he was en route from Ambon. Jaffar was charged with inciting violence and threatening the life of the Indonesian President during a speech in Ambon. Dozens of bombs, mortar rounds and shooting were heard throughout the city overnight, which resulted in two deaths and over 30 injured.

Sporadic violence continued for most of the month with many international organizations operating out of separate Muslim and Christian offices until late May. At the end of May the central government announced the formation of a special operations military command for Maluku to be headed by a two-star general named Djoko Santoso. This command will exist alongside the current Pattimura territorial command and General Santoso will succeed General Mustopo as head of the command. Legal experts and human rights activists have been quick to point out that there is no legal basis for establishment of the special command and that the move was tantamount to declaring martial law." (USAID 31 May 2002)

"April was characterized by renewed violence on the island of Ambon that has created grave doubts about the recently agreed Malino Declaration. The latest bout of unrest began with a bomb explosion on April 3 that killed three people in one of Ambon's neutral areas and led to expressions of outrage that culminated with the burning of the governor's office a day later. These incidents were followed by the flying of the Maluku separatist movement RMS flag on April 25, and an attack on Soya village on April 27 that left 14 Christians dead, dozens wounded, and houses and a church destroyed. In the aftermath of this attack, possibly inspired by a fiery Friday sermon in an Ambon mosque by Laskar Jihad's Ja'far Umar Thalib, international NGOs and UN agencies active in the province took the precaution of evacuating most of their international staff until the security situation stabilizes. As of the end of April, the situation in Ambon remains extremely tense with sporadic incidents of violence. There is a debate underway as to whether or not the Central Government should impose a more restrictive martial law regime in the Malukus but for the time being, the civil emergency rules will stay in place." (USAID 30 April 2002)

Aceh

Civil emergency replaces martial law but humanitarian access remains problematic (June 2004)

- 3 weeks after the lifting of martial law, the governor of Aceh officially took over control of command.
- Restriction on the entry of foreigners will continue to apply, preventing international aid agencies to work in the province.

"Mr. Abdullah Puteh, the Governor of Aceh officially took over the command from the martial law administrator on 07 June 2004, almost three weeks after the government changed the province's status to a state of civil emergency. The transfer of command and operational control order were signed in a ceremony presided over by acting Coordinating Minister for Political and Security Affairs Mr. Hari Sabarno. A team of 18 assistants and observers would assist the civil emergency Administrator to help outline policies and solve problems that may occur during the civil emergency, and to monitor budget disbursement. The Governor reiterated that despite the province's change of status to civil emergency, a number of regulations from the martial law period still apply, including restriction on foreigners entering the province. This restriction will continue to hamper the humanitarian operations of international organizations (UN, Donors and International NGOs) in the province." (OCHA 30 June 2004)

"It has been four weeks since the Indonesian government announced the end of the year long Martial Law in Aceh, and the instigation of the Civil Emergency in the region. The government has said that the military operation to fight the Free Aceh Movement (known by its Indonesian acronym GAM) will continue in tandem with integrated policies on security, law enforcement, bureaucratic empowerment, economic recovery and humanitarian action.

Authority in the region has been handed over to the civil government. Despite the change of status, the governor of Aceh announced that a number of regulations, implemented during the period under Martial Law, will remain in force. On June 9, a new decree restricting access for humanitarian agencies and journalists in the region was issued by the governor.

Meanwhile, the conflict rages on in several parts of Aceh. Less than a month into civil emergency another 39 lives have reportedly been lost, indicating that civilians are still at risk of being caught in hostilities. Human rights organizations warn that continuous military operation represents a serious threat to human rights, both at the hands of the Indonesian military and GAM.

"Due to restricted access to the region, it is not possible to verify information on the humanitarian situation in Aceh; however, the humanitarian community is concerned that the prolonged conflict is causing extreme suffering to civilians in the war affected areas', said Ingvild Solvang, JRS Indonesia Advocacy Manager." (JRS 23 June 2004)

Ramadan allows for improved access and monitoring in isolated areas (November 2003)

- Despite the continuing of the military operation during Ramadan, PBI clients report that the atmosphere is lively especially in urban centers where the security is stable.
- Some organisations have taken the opportunity of Ramadan to move around more easily and collect data on the delivering of supplies to isolated areas.
- The raid of the Komnas HAM training on human rights monitoring in Banda Aceh on 20 October 2003 as an example of how martial law conditions restrict even government institutions from working in the field of human rights.

"PBI clients generally report that the start of Ramadan (the Islamic fasting month) has brought a lively atmosphere to the cities in Aceh. They describe a climate of confidence where people have the courage to stay out late after breaking their daily fast at sunset. This is particularly the case in urban centers where the security situation remains stable; however, they say that outside major towns the situation continues to be characterised by armed skirmishes, sweepings by both GAM (Gerakan Aceh Merdeka, Free Aceh Movement) and security forces, kidnappings, killings, and other acts of violence.

The flow of people back to their home cities and villages during Ramadan has presented a window of opportunity for some PBI client organizations to collect data from and deliver program related supplies to isolated areas. Clients generally feel that travel in this time is safer because it attracts less attention at security force check posts. Due to ongoing suspicion towards the work of nongovernment organisations, they often do not carry identification that links them with their organization while traveling.

The planned extension of martial law in Aceh as announced by the Indonesian government on 3 November 2003 has prompted several clients to express concern that their activities will remain restricted and continue to be the subject of suspicion from security forces. They cite the recent raid of the Komnas HAM (Komisi Nasional Hak Asasi Manusia, National Commission for Human Rights) training on human rights monitoring in Banda Aceh on 20 October 2003 as an example of how martial law conditions restrict even government institutions from working in the field of human rights. The event was attended by several members of PBI client organisations who were questioned by the police about their participation. Furthermore, while noting several demonstrations apparently supporting the extension of martial law, clients maintain that there has been no space for political discussion or criticism towards martial law." (PBI 6 November 2003)

Humanitarian actors denied access in Aceh since imposition of martial law (October 2003)

- Martial law has classified the province in 4 different areas according to security criterias: white areas (GAM absent), grey areas (little support to GAM but no GAM presence), Red area (GAM members and support fro GAM), and the black area (stronghold of GAM)
- Presidential Decree 43/2003 and subsequent regulations do not outright ban international humanitarian organisations, but place severe restrictions on, and proscribe significant administrative barriers for, international personnel to be present in Banda Aceh.
- High levels of distrust of NGOs, the UN, and the international community in general are a primary factor in restricting access to conflict areas.
- Restrictions on movements are not limited to international organisations and local NGO partner organisations find it similarly difficult to undertake field travel .
- HRW fears that the lack of access and monitoring by independent observers could create a climate in which military forces on both sides believe they can act with impunity and commit abuses, unreported and away from the public eye.

"When martial law came into effect, the province of Aceh was classified into different areas determined by the martial law administration:

1. White Area: This indicates an area where there is no GAM influence. Most of these areas are towns close to military bases.
2. Grey Area: This indicates an area where there are a few people who give financial support to GAM. However, there are no GAM members in these areas.
3. Red Area: This indicates an area where people support GAM. There are also GAM members in these areas, but no GAM barracks.
4. Black Area: This indicates an area that is a stronghold of GAM and the people fully support GAM. There are also GAM barracks in these areas. Since August 2003, the black areas have been fully under military control, and subdistrict heads have been appointed from military officers. There are 13 subdistricts that have been classified as black areas. " (Laksamana.net 2 October 2003)

"Since May 2003, travel within the province of Aceh has been severely restricted for the international humanitarian community and independent humanitarian needs' assessments have not been possible. Presidential Decree 43/2003 and subsequent regulations issued by the Martial Law Authority of the Aceh Military Command do not outright ban international humanitarian organisations, but place severe restrictions on, and proscribe significant administrative barriers for, international personnel to be present in Banda Aceh.

The regulations require that all assistance to the province be directed through the government ministries, restrict international organisations from working with local NGOs, and prohibit direct interaction with affected communities by international humanitarian organisations. In addition, in July the GoI established a 'Blue Book' procedure – a mechanism to obtain permission to travel to the province of Aceh that would be valid for 14 days only, after which another application would have to be submitted.

The international humanitarian community has endeavoured to follow these administrative requirements closely. In August, one international NGO submitted an application for two international staff members to obtain Blue Books; some weeks later this request was denied by the GoI. Currently none of the INGOs that were working in the province of Aceh have been able to secure permission for their international staff to return to Banda Aceh.

The official reason for limiting the presence of international humanitarian personnel in the province is that their security cannot be guaranteed. However, informal comments by government officials indicate that high levels of distrust of NGOs, the UN, and the international community in general are a primary factor in restricting access to conflict areas. There is clearly a lack of knowledge and trust in the principles and motives of international humanitarian agencies.

At the same time, the international humanitarian community is keen to engage in constructive dialogue and negotiation with the authorities, so as to clarify the purpose of humanitarian action and to find practical ways for humanitarian principles to be upheld in practice. In this respect, it must be noted that access starts with a presence. Presence alone, however, is not sufficient for humanitarian action. Presence must be complemented by the independent assessment of needs, the unimpeded and free distribution of relief, and the monitoring of that distribution, which must all be carried out in respect of humanitarian principles.

In addition, there are serious concerns that the restrictions on the freedom of movement of humanitarian actors may not be limited to international staff as there have been cases of harassment of national staff in the past and local NGO partner organisations find it similarly difficult to undertake field travel and to interact with IDPs and other conflict-affected communities." (ICVA 5 September 2003)

"Since the fighting began, the Indonesian government has succeeded in severely limiting the flow of information from the province. It has denied access to Aceh to diplomats, independent international observers, and international human rights NGOs. It has advised U.N. humanitarian agencies and foreign humanitarian NGOs to leave the province. Indonesian NGO workers attempting to monitor the situation have been detained by the police. Without offering proof, several have been listed as suspected GAM sympathizers. Local phone service has been disrupted and a series of military checkpoints now controls movement along the main highway in and out of Aceh (from Banda Aceh to Medan in North Sumatra).

Human Rights Watch fears that the lack of access and monitoring by independent observers could create a climate in which military forces on both sides believe they can act with impunity and commit abuses, unreported and away from the public eye.

Lack of access to humanitarian agencies may also foreshadow a humanitarian disaster as supplies run short in the province. The government has insisted that aid be funneled through the government, but donors are concerned about possible corruption and the ability of the government to undertake this difficult logistical task.

Until independent monitors are allowed access to the province, reports of human rights violations will remain difficult to verify. Human Rights Watch welcomes the decision to allow a team from the Jakarta office of Komnas HAM, to Aceh to carry out investigations into alleged human rights violations. This is a step in the right direction, but is not sufficient. Human Rights Watch urges the Indonesian government to allow immediate access to the province for international human rights groups and observers. Lack of access will only fuel rumors and fear. If Indonesia has nothing to hide, it should immediately open the province to international and national observers." (HRW 5 June 2003, pp. 1-2)

Military crackdown on humanitarian workers and human rights activists (April 2004)

- Komnas HAM has set up a human rights monitoring body in Aceh following the imposition of martial law in May 2003.
- On October 20, the Police interrupted a training on human rights requesting the organizers to submit a list of participants. Upon refusal, the training was halted.
- Since martial law was imposed number of NGOs and civil society organizations that used to operate in Aceh have been pronounced illegal and their activists threatened with arrest.
- Because of the increasing level of violence against human rights defenders since the imposition of martial law, several have either gone into hiding or left Aceh to save their lives and avoid being added to the death toll.

"The Indonesian military has a history of targeting those who oppose the government's dictate. In Aceh, many political activists and human rights defenders have been killed, disappeared and arrested. Since martial law, the policy of stamping out dissenting voices has intensified. A few days after the imposition of martial law, Cut Nur Asikin, founder of the women's NGO Srikandi, was arrested, charged with treason, and sentenced to 11 years imprisonment. The main evidence presented in court against her was pictures of her taking part in anti-government demonstration. In total, more than 150 Acehnese have been charged with treason under draconian Indonesian laws. In Indonesia, where the judicial system is characterised by corruption, one's sentence has more to do with the amount of money available to bribe the prosecutors and the judges than with the evidence presented in court. Most activists have now left the province. In Aceh, civil society has been all but silenced." (Eye on Aceh April 2004)

"Since martial law began on May 19th, 2003, KOMNAS HAM has set up a body to conduct human rights monitoring in Aceh, headed by Mr. Billah, the head of KOMNAS HAM's Aceh team. Mr. Billah is also the facilitator of the raided training session that is supposed to take place from October 19th to October 23rd. Before this training course, KOMNAS HAM had informed the regional martial law authority (PDMD) and also Polresta, the Police authority in Banda Aceh, that they would be holding this course.

On October 20th, during the morning session, two military representatives from the PDMD were included in the training programme, based on their request to be included as "participants". At lunchtime, both of them left the training session and at 3 p.m., around 20 troops and 20 police officers came to the Seulawah pavilion where the training session was being held. They turned off the lights in order to sabotage the training programme. The members of the military and the police tried to come in, but Mr. Billah prevented them from doing so. They asked for the lists of participants, but Mr. Billah refused to give it to them and also refused to stop the meeting, leading to an exchange of words and negotiations with the police who wanted to take him to headquarters for questioning.

On October 21st, PDMD troops still occupied the Seulawah pavilion. The police members denied that they had been informed about the training course and members of the military said that permission was needed to hold it. As part of the government, KOMNAS HAM clearly does not require permission to hold such a session. Since that time, the training session has been interrupted.

The Observatory is particularly concerned for the personal integrity of the participants in the training session, as the military are seeking to gain a list of their identities, and there are serious concerns that their integrity may be at risk as a result of this." (OMCT 21 October 2003)

"Since martial law began, a number of non-governmental organizations and civil society organizations that used to operate in Aceh have been pronounced illegal by the Martial Law Administration and their activists threatened with arrest. Major General Endang [Suwarya], as the martial law administrator in Aceh, on May 20 said he had received a number of names from military intelligence, which he would use as the basis for making arrests. Most of them are human rights defenders and political activists who seek to achieve their goals through non-violence.

Monitoring activities have come to a halt because human rights defenders, including the many activists and volunteers spread across Aceh working for Kontras, have gone into hiding. The number of activists already arrested is not known. The first person known to be detained was Cut Nur Asikin, a prominent women's rights activist of the Srikandi Aceh women's organization. She was denied the right to be accompanied by lawyers because under the terms of the martial law, she was initially accused of terrorism. However, after strong pressure from the national and international community, she is now trial and accused of sedition. Not only local NGOs and activists [are facing difficulties]. Indonesia's Coordinator Minister for Social Affairs, Yusuf Kalla, has said that foreign NGOs will be prohibited from operating any longer in Aceh.

Because of the increasing level of violence against human rights defenders since the imposition of martial law, several have either gone into hiding or left Aceh to save their lives and avoid being added to the death toll.

The two aforementioned examples signal the new pattern of violence against human rights defenders in Aceh. And we do believe, those examples are a form of psychological [warfare] against other human rights activists in Aceh. The new patterns are:

1. An activist is killed and his/her body is left for other people to find. The impact is that other activists will become silent to avoid joining the death toll.
2. An activist is arrested together with his/her father or family members. The impact is that he/she must stop his/her activities to save his/her family members.

This martial law has not only affected human rights defenders in Aceh, but has also affected outspoken human rights defenders in Indonesia. For example, in Jakarta, the offices of Kontras and PBHI (the Indonesian Legal Aid Association) were attacked by militias known as Pemuda Panca Marga (military youth wing). On this point, it can be concluded that the state, including the military and police, is using civilians to perpetrate acts of intimidation against human rights defenders; while there is no mechanism to guarantee the right of human rights defenders to work in Indonesia.

Several conclusions can be made from the aforementioned events.

1. Martial law in Aceh is being used as a tool to marginalize Aceh from the international community, as inferred from the statement from the Coordinating Minister for Social Affairs and Presidential Decree No.43/2003.

2. Martial law is being used a tool to bring about the collapse of civil society in Aceh, despite civil society organizations urging the government to allow freedom for expression without any hindrances.

Aceh has the greatest record in terms of violence against human rights defenders in Indonesia. Since the downfall of the Suharto regime in 1998 to August 2003, about 129 human rights defenders were victims of various forms of violations, including arbitrary detention, summary killings/executions, forced disappearance, etc. Since martial law was declared on May 19, the Indonesian security authorities and the Free Aceh Movement have violated the human rights of 21 activists. Two cases were perpetrated by GAM (when two journalists were detained by them), and 19 cases were perpetrated by the Indonesian military and police. Unfortunately, none of the cases of gross violations against human rights defenders in Aceh have been investigated or brought to court." (Laksamana.net 2 October 2003)"

"Human Rights Watch is particularly concerned by the Indonesian military's public pronouncements that it will crack down on civil society groups and members it suspects of being GAM sympathizers.

On June 3, Sayed Musaini, the Aceh provincial police spokesman, said that students and other activists who support separatist guerillas in Indonesia's Aceh province will face subversion charges. He said that the police had a list of activists who support or assist GAM. "We will use the criminal code article on subversion, which carries up to the death sentence, against them," said Sayed. Sayed did not specify the number on the list, but said "they number a lot." He identified some as students at the Ar-Raniry State Institute for Religious Sciences in Banda Aceh, and others as NGO members. He specifically named Kautsar bin Muhammad Yus, son of the head of the provincial parliament, as among the group. He also named the Information Center on a Referendum for Aceh, a pro-independence organization, and Society's Solidarity for the People.

Sayed's comments followed a briefing on May 21 by Major General Endang Suwarya, who announced that the TNI would arrest members of NGOs who they believed to be supporting separatist activities. Suwarya specifically identified two NGOs: SIRA (Sentral Informasi Referendum Aceh, Aceh Referendum Information Center) and SMUR (Solidaritas Mahasiswa Untuk Rakyat, Student Solidarity for the Peoples' Movement). SIRA and SMUR have long been targeted in Aceh for being aligned with GAM, though no evidence has been produced of any formal political or military link.

Human Rights Watch has also received reports that the Indonesian military has a more comprehensive list of targeted NGOs, which includes the Banda Aceh branch of the established and respected national human rights NGO, "The Commission for the Disappeared and the Victims of Violence" (Kontras)." Government issues a Presidential decree to restrict international presence outside Aceh's capital (September 2003)

- Although not formally banning foreign organisations to operate in Aceh, the Presidential decree 43 issued on 16 June 2003 provides strict regulations on the activities of international organisations to operate outside of Banda Aceh, the capital. In practice, no international organisations are allowed to travel outside the capital.
- On June 30, an internal visa system for Aceh province, applicable to international aid workers and foreign correspondents was introduced by the Ministry of Justice. The 'blue book' describes the procedures to get clearance from Jakarta. In practice, only national staff from UN agencies or international NGOs are permitted to access areas outside of Banda Aceh. ICRC pulled out in protest to this regulation.

"Since the collapse of the ceasefire in Aceh, and the subsequent declaration of martial law, U.N. agencies and international nongovernmental organizations (NGOs) in the province, in consultation with donors, have directed their efforts towards meeting the immediate needs for food, clean water, and shelter of those affected by the current conflict. However, international humanitarian bodies have been severely restricted in their ability to distribute or monitor the distribution of aid, due to new government regulations, ambiguity over the implementation of the new regulations, and ongoing security concerns.

On June 16, 2003, the Indonesian government issued Presidential Decree No. 43 of 2003, concerning "The Arrangement of Activities of Foreigners, Non-Government Organisations and the Press in Nanggroe Aceh Darussalam Province." This decree states in section 2 that:

1. International and local non-governmental organisations are not allowed to conduct activities contrary to the objectives of the Military Emergency Conditions in Nanggroe Aceh Darussalam Province.
2. Humanitarian assistance from friendly countries, international bodies, and international and local non-governmental organisations in Nanggroe Aceh Darussalam Province are co-ordinated by the Co-ordinating Minister of Social Welfare on behalf of the President as the Central Military Emergency Authority.

Despite the decree's vague reference to "activities contrary to the objectives of the Military Emergency Conditions," the martial law administration has made it clear that it interprets this clause to mean that no international personnel from the U.N. or international NGOs may travel outside of the capital. Moreover, the reference in the second clause to "coordination" by the Minister of Social Welfare has been used by the government to require that all relief supplies bound for the countryside of Aceh be distributed by government agencies alone.

On June 27, 2003, the Resident U.N. Coordinator and Humanitarian Coordinator in Jakarta, Bo Asplund, wrote to the Coordinating Minister of People's Welfare, Jusuf Kalla, requesting letters permitting all international U.N. and NGO staff to resume their activities throughout Aceh. To date those letters have not been forthcoming.

Blue Books

The Ministry of Justice and Human Rights on June 30, 2003, issued a ministerial decree outlining the procedure for access to Aceh by international humanitarian actors. This introduced what is essentially an internal visa system for Aceh province, applicable to international aid workers and foreign correspondents. Under this so-called "blue book" procedure, no access to Aceh is allowed without a pre-approved blue book, with its relevant Jakarta authorization.

In compliance with the blue book procedure, international staff workers left Banda Aceh for Jakarta to obtain the new blue books required for access to Aceh, on the understanding that it would allow them greater access to the province. On August 8, 2003, Asplund met with the Coordinating Minister of Social Welfare, Jusuf Kalla, who told him that only Indonesian national staff of U.N. agencies and international NGOs would now be allowed outside of Banda Aceh and that full access for others would rest with the discretion of the martial law administrator in Banda Aceh. This was in contradiction to the previous understanding that international blue book bearers would have full access to the province.

To date, only two international staff members of U.N. agencies have received blue books to go to Banda Aceh. Both of these have subsequently expired, and only one has been renewed. No international staff persons from international NGOs have yet been issued a blue book permit. In protest over the new blue book procedures, the International Committee of the Red Cross closed its office in Banda Aceh, and withdrew all international staff.

The government of Indonesia has repeatedly stated that the restriction of access for foreigners is directly related to security concerns. Specifically, the government has emphasized that it does not want a repeat of the incident at Atambua, West Timor, when militias killed three international U.N. staff in 2000. A government may take appropriate steps to ensure the safety of civilians in or near combat zones. However, many international aid workers have taken the government's references to Atambua as a warning aimed to keep them out of Aceh, rather than as a statement of the government's concern for their security. In light of these fears, it is incumbent on Indonesian authorities to clarify its position to the aid community.

Under international law the Indonesian government is responsible for ensuring secure access for international humanitarian assistance. In a statement issued on May 29, the U.N. secretary-general called on the Indonesian government to "ensure the necessary security conditions to allow international aid organizations safe and unhindered access to affected populations." On June 20, in a briefing to the Security Council on the protection of civilians in armed conflict, the U.N. Under-Secretary-General Kenzo Oshima noted his concern at "recent policies of the Indonesian Government suggesting constraints on the delivery of international humanitarian assistance" in Aceh. Human Rights Watch shares these concerns." (HRW September 2003, pp. 2-4)

Peace monitors withdrawn from Aceh as peace agreement crumbles (May 2003)

- 53 peace monitors withdrawn from Aceh while fresh Indonesian troops arrive in Aceh

"Hopes of reviving an ailing peace pact in Indonesia's Aceh province were further dashed on Wednesday as international monitors overseeing the landmark agreement started pulling out of the country.

The team of 53 monitors, most of them Thais and Filipinos, left Aceh on Monday for nearby North Sumatra province and Jakarta pending a last-minute effort to bring government and rebels together to avert a threatened Indonesian military offensive.

But the Geneva-based Henry Dunant Centre (HDC), which brokered the December peace deal, said it had been decided that the monitors should return to their countries.

"Some will be leaving today and some will leave tomorrow. They will come back if there is some development in the resumption of talks," David Gorman, who heads the HDC operations in Aceh, told Reuters without elaborating. He said the HDC's own 13 international staff would remain in Indonesia." (Reuters 14 May 2003)

"More than 50 international peace monitors withdrew Monday from Indonesia's Aceh province where a ceasefire in the separatist war is close to collapse.

The group -- 43 Thais, eight Filipinos and one Norwegian -- flew out of Banda Aceh airport aboard a C-130 military aircraft, witnesses said.

David Gorman of the Henry Dunant Centre (HDC), an international mediation group, said the monitors would stay at Medan in neighbouring North Sumatra or in Jakarta for the time being.

Many more troops, with rifles ready, were seen patrolling the provincial capital Banda Aceh on Monday -- the last day of a government deadline for the Free Aceh Movement (GAM) to announce it is shelving its independence demand and will start disarming.

Fresh troops have been pouring into the province in Sumatra island in recent days in expectation of a military offensive." (AFP 12 May 2003)

Establishment of peace zones in Aceh has helped reduce violence (March 2003)

- As of February 2003, 7 peace zones were established in Aceh.

- Level of violence and numbers of deaths has been reduced since the December 2002 peace agreement and the establishment of peace zones.

"Six new "peace zones" have been established in Indonesia's Aceh province, a joint committee monitoring the truce between the government and separatist rebels said Monday.

The agreement on the zones clearly shows the commitment to peace by Indonesia and the Free Aceh Movement (GAM) as they start a demilitarization process in the province, said Major General Tanongsuk Tuvunin in a statement.

"We've had a good couple of weeks. Deaths and armed clashes are even lower than they have been and now we've got these peace zones," Tanongsuk said in the statement.

The Thai general is the senior envoy of the Joint Security Committee (JSC), which is made up of representatives from the government, the rebels and foreign monitors from the Geneva-based Henry Dunant Centre (HDC).

One peace zone had previously been declared. Rebels and soldiers and police will also be able to move freely in the zones but will not be allowed to carry weapons.

Aceh, which has witnessed 26 years of bloody violence, began the first day of a five-month demilitarization phase on Sunday.

During this period GAM should start placing weapons at secret designated sites while the army relocates its forces and changes its role "from a strike force to a defensive force".

The HDC has reported a major decline in deaths since the December 9 accord was signed in Geneva to end the separatist war in which an estimated 10,000 people died." (AFP 10 February 2003)

Security situation has improved but remains fragile (March 2003)

- Security situation remains highly fragile due to the deep-rooted hatred and sense of revenge which exist within the conflicting communities.
- Successful implementation of Malino Declaration can be jeopardized by premature returns

"While the security environment has improved remarkably, it remains highly fragile due to the deep-rooted hatred and sense of revenge which exist within the conflicting communities. An IDP head of village in Tentena stated that the situation could only be considered adequately secure if the security forces withdraw and no security incidents take place. Similar feelings were expressed almost across all IDP communities which indicate that the return process should continue with cautious. IDPs need time to recover from the past experience (trauma) and build confidence in security situation. The successful implementation of Malino Declaration can be jeopardized if a premature return were enforced, without giving IDPs sufficient time and assistance to make appropriate decision." (OCHA & Bakornas March 2003, p. 2)

Reduction of UN security phase in West Timor allows for humanitarian access (June 2004)

"Based on the recommendation from the UNSECOORD mission, who visited the province in mid-May 2004, the UN Secretary General has lifted the evacuation status in West Timor which was in force since the tragic killings of three UNHCR staff in Atambua in 2000. The UN security phase in West Timor has thus been reduced to Phase IV from Phase V. This will now allow the UN agencies to begin direct assistance activities in the area in close coordination with the relevant Government counterparts, and in close collaboration with donors and interested NGO partners. Presence of UN agency international staff in West Timor is currently being determined." (OCHA 30 June 2004)

Security phase in West Timor negatively impacts on implementation and monitoring of programmes (April 2004)

"Despite improved security in West Timor, particularly in the provincial capital Kupang, West Timor remains under UN Security Phase V, impeding UN agencies from implementing and monitoring programmes. However, in addition to the government's efforts to support the former refugees, several international NGOs are implementing programme activities mainly of emergency nature. The security phase has also negatively impacted on economic development, investment, and tourism." (UNOCHA 9 April 2004, p. 17)

NATIONAL AND INTERNATIONAL RESPONSES

National response to internal displacement in Indonesia

Government's IDP strategy for 2004 (June 2003)

- Government IDP strategy for 2004 is pursuant to the IDP policy adopted in September 2001, which offered three options to IDPs: return, integration in areas of displacement and relocation elsewhere.
- Responsibility for IDP assistance will in 2004 be transferred to local governments.
- Priority will be given to solve the problems for IDPs in camps.
- Government does not want the IDP problems to disrupt the national elections scheduled for mid 2004 and will therefore aim at solving the problem by the end of 2003.
- In 2004, immediate needs and the development of long term secure livelihoods for them will be delivered through the Government's general social programs already in place aimed at poverty alleviation, community and economic development.

"As their continued displacement had been considered harmful to development, in September 2001 the Government adopted a three pronged strategy to solve the problem; the encouragement and support of returns to places of origin as the main component; and only if return is not possible, empowerment at the site of displacement; or supported relocation. All efforts at assisting to solve the IDP crisis, including by the international humanitarian organisations and local NGOs must be consistent with this policy.

There is still much more that needs to be done to solve the crises, particularly for the 740,000 persons that remain displaced. The National Government cannot do this alone and it is the will and determination of local communities that is now most needed. Mr. Budi Atmadi outlined the following key elements of a future strategy:

The cause of the conflicts and violence need to be tackled and adequate law and order needs to be ensured. Following the two Malino agreements, developments have been moving in the right direction, but the problems are not completely solved;

The provincial governments will be the focal points in the search for solutions and for assistance programmes. This will be in accordance with the Government's plan to decentralise social and other services.

Priority will be given to solve the problems for IDPs in camps. This would help to prevent radicalism and criminality, which are always dangerous factors in a heterogeneous country such as Indonesia.

The Government had signaled its plan that all IDP problems should be solved by the middle of 2003, but in reality the problem of IDPs as managed at present, must continue until the end of the year, and there will be no budget reduction. For these reasons it is essential that funds remaining for the period 2003 to assist IDP solutions be put to maximum use. But the Government will not allow the IDP problems to be used to disrupt the national elections scheduled for mid 2004 and hence is determined to ensure durable solutions are put in place for all IDPs by the end of this year. But this does not refute the rights of IDPs.

Those who continue to require support by this date will not be forgotten, although there will be no central budget for IDPs in 2004. Their immediate needs and the development of long term secure livelihoods for them will be delivered through the Government's general social programs already in place aimed at poverty alleviation, community and economic development. The Government also recognises that assistance directed only at IDPs will not fully resolve the problem.

The Central Government will continue to ensure that these strategic objectives are met, through the provision of security, humanitarian assistance, coordination and empowerment of local governments to overcome the challenges before us. As examples of coordination, he mentioned the two regional inter-governmental evaluation meetings, which had been held in Riau in April Considerations for the Management of IDPs in 2003, presented by Bakornas PBP at the meeting in Pekanbaru, Riau, was included in the documentation prepared for the Workshop. and in Manado in March 2003." (Bakornas PBP & OCHA July 2003, pp. 6-7)

Coordinating Minister for People's Welfare & BAKORNAS PBP in charge of the humanitarian response

"The primary responsibility for the provision of humanitarian assistance to those in need rests with the GoRI. Within the GoRI, the Coordinating Minister for People's Welfare, assisted by BAKORNAS PBP, coordinates the activities of several government Departments to ensure the comprehensive and coordinated delivery of humanitarian assistance to the affected population. Over the past few years, efforts have been made to enhance the capacity of BAKORNAS PBP at national level and of its subsidiary branches at provincial and district levels, respectively the Executive Coordinating Unit for Disaster Management and the Handling of IDPs (SATAKORLAK PBP) and the Executive Unit for Disaster Management and the Handling of IDPs (SATLAK).

In Central Kalimantan, Central Sulawesi, East Java, Maluku, North Maluku, West Kalimantan, and West Timor, SATAKORLAK and SATLAK coordinate the management of humanitarian activities, with financial support and policy guidance from the central government. In Aceh, BAKORNAS PBP and a number of departments at the central level have taken over the responsibility for coordinating humanitarian efforts." (OCHA 9 April 2004, p. 11)

Government acknowledges its responsibility towards IDPs (June 2002)

- A major portion of support for protection and assistance to IDPs is provided by the authorities.
- At the provincial level, needs are addressed through the governor as head of the Satkorlak.

"The Government of Indonesia acknowledges its responsibility for addressing the IDP problem and it is reported that a major portion of support for protection and assistance to the concerned populations is provided by the authorities. There is also a substantial contribution from the international community and national non- governmental bodies. At the provincial level, needs are addressed through the governor as head of the Satkorlak, a coordinating body entrusted with channelling inputs (food, non- food assistance/supplies, emergency shelter, water, sanitation, education) from sectoral departments and ministries.

According to the Government, emergency assistance has been provided on an extensive scale to IDPs for almost three years throughout Indonesia. The growing scale of the problem has prompted the Government to initiate strategies aimed at providing durable solutions for the IDPs and reducing displacement in the country." Relief framework at the national, provincial and local levels (August 2000)

- At the national level, coordination mechanisms for the UN and international agencies are supported by OCHA through a strengthened Humanitarian Coordination Unit, attached to the Coordinator. This unit ensures coordination with the governmental agencies involved in aid and relief.
- WHO and WFP will lead the coordination of medical and food help, respectively, while UNDP will be in charge of the reconciliation, rehabilitation, reconstruction and capacity-building process.
- To facilitate the coordination between humanitarian agencies and local authorities in the Maluku provinces, UN Resource Centres will be opened in Ambon and in Ternate.
- The main national institutions responsible for the administration of the relief and rehabilitation process are: the Coordinating Ministry for People's Welfare and Poverty Alleviation, the State Ministry for Societal Affairs, the Ministry of Human Settlements and Regional Development and the Ministry of Health as members of Bakornas.

National level

"[UN] agencies are committed to coordinate their programming and operations through a coordination structure under the leadership of the UN Resident Coordinator for Indonesia. Coordination mechanisms at Jakarta level will be supported by OCHA through a strengthened Humanitarian Coordination Unit, attached to the Coordinator. This unit will ensure coordination with the government, notably through BakornasPB/SatkorlakPB and the Indonesian Red Cross Society (PMI), as well as with all other humanitarian partners.

In the health sector, WHO will take the lead for overall technical coordination and health needs assessments, while WFP will ensure the lead role in the food sector. UNDP will play a lead role for reconciliation, rehabilitation and reconstruction support and capacity-building. For some sectors, notably temporary shelter and camp management, the international support mechanism still has to be clarified.

Coordination offices, or UN Resource Centres, will be opened in Ambon and Ternate. Their role will be to facilitate contacts between humanitarian agencies and local authorities, to ensure that there are no gaps nor overlaps in the provision of assistance, to identify the measures needed to bridge humanitarian aid and development and to promote humanitarian principles."

The main [national] institutions responsible for the administration of the relief and rehabilitation process are the Coordinating Ministry for People's Welfare and Poverty Alleviation, the State Ministry for Societal Affairs, the Ministry of Human Settlements and Regional Development and the Ministry of Health as members of Bakornas PB. Each will use their resources according to their respective mandates. National reconciliation activities will be coordinated through the Office of the Vice-President. The Government has also requested the Indonesian Red Cross Society (PMI) to coordinate the delivery of relief assistance, including the activities of national and international NGOs.

Provincial level

In each province, Satkorlak PB is the equivalent of Bakornas PB at the national level. In Maluku Province, Satkorlak PB is led by the Vice-governor, but the secretariat needs considerable strengthening. In the new province of North Maluku, the Satkorlak PB structure is virtually non-existent. As mentioned above, although operational, the various service sectors are largely divided into two entities servicing the two separated communities, although some coordination is still feasible through the governor's office and through the military hospital." (OCHA March 2000, pp. 14; 55)

Local level

"The sequential chain in GoI deliveries is that Satkorlak establishes needs and specifies quantities to BKSNI, which then requests rice releases from Dolog; these releases are made to Satkorlak, which undertakes deliveries to community leaders, who then are responsible for distributions. GoI's involvement in the chain stops at the level of the community leader." (WFP 31 July-24 August 2000, p. 2)

Legal framework and national policy

In 2004 assistance to IDPs in most areas will be integrated with general poverty alleviation strategies (June 2003)

- IDP problem will be solved in many provinces by end 2003 and the focus will then be long-term solutions for people who remain displaced in 2004
- Starting from 2004, assistance to IDPs and victims of conflict will not comprise a special sectoral fund, but instead will be integrated with general poverty alleviation strategies and funding except in Central Sulawesi, Maluku and East Nusa Tenggara.
- In the UN's view, the Indonesian Government's commitment to resolving the multiple crises of inter-communal conflict and the resulting displacement has been exemplary

"In some provinces the IDP problem will be nearly fully solved by the end of the year but in some provinces significant numbers of families will continue to be displaced. The focus should now be on finding long-term durable solutions for those that remain.

The experience with solving the IDP crises in Indonesia shows that best practice is achievable when local government and civil society groups closely coordinate activities and share experiences along with thinking in dealing with the problems underlying the conflict, as well as treating its effects including overcoming post-conflict trauma suffered by victims of the conflict.

Starting from 2004, assistance to IDPs and victims of conflict will not comprise a special sectoral fund, but instead will be integrated with general poverty alleviation strategies and funding except in the three provinces where longer-term solutions for significant numbers of IDPs and ex-refugees are likely to remain unmet (that is, Central Sulawesi, Maluku and East Nusa Tenggara). This change shifts greater independence to the provinces in dealing with IDP issues and avoids the potential problems of creating jealousies in local communities as to who is eligible for assistance. It also encourages a more holistic area strategy rather than a piecemeal approach focusing only on one category of person. The Government is also concerned that the IDP issue could be manipulated to disrupt the forthcoming national elections.

In some circumstances spontaneous or "natural" returns are most appropriate (for example in Central Kalimantan).

The Indonesian Government's commitment to resolving the multiple crises of inter-communal conflict and the resulting displacement has been exemplary by international standards." (Bakornas PBP & OCHA July 2003, p. 27)

Obstacles to implementing Government's policy on IDPs (June 2002)

- Growing scale of the problem has prompted the Government to initiate strategies aimed at providing durable solutions for the IDPs and reducing displacement in the country.
- Tight timeframe is likely to lead to forced relocation and therefore the date of 31 December 2002 should only be considered as indicative.
- Implementing returns may not be applicable for large numbers of IDPs in the regions where the conflict is still ongoing.
- Introducing a variety of confidence building and reconciliation projects and schemes to facilitate dialogue between communities could facilitate community integration and diminish resentment towards the displaced.
- Substantial financial resources are required to implement all policy options envisaged on the behalf of IDPs and a strengthening of planning processes, increased efficiency, reduced corruption and improved capacity will have to be demonstrated by the government if international funding is to come forward.

"In September 2001, the Government introduced three options to be available to IDPs namely, Return to places of origin; Empowerment (i.e. local integration in current places of residence) or Relocation elsewhere. Broadly speaking, the policy appears to be in line with the Guiding Principles and follows a common pattern found elsewhere.

The discussion in the Workshop however pointed to a number of obstacles/ constraints to implementing these solutions:

i. timeframe

The Government policy stipulates that implementation of durable solutions should be completed by 31 December 2002. It was even suggested during the October 2001 mission that this deadline would be maintained in any circumstances, the Guiding Principles and other international norms, notwithstanding.

Workshop participants, especially the provincial representatives quickly pointed out that this consideration was unrealistic, knowing the realities on the ground, even allowing for adequate political and security conditions. They emphasised the need to place solutions in the context of the specific conditions of the province/region concerned. For this reason, they were more inclined to a pace of implementation based on an analysis of the actual conditions. These qualifications will have a considerable impact on the Government's policy directions and, as we understand it, will be quickly conveyed by Bakornas to the coordinating Minister responsible for IDPs for eventual submission to the Cabinet. At the same time the provincial authorities indicated that they shared the Central Government's conviction that the "automatic" or continued provision of emergency assistance to IDPs in all situations in Indonesia should be reviewed drastically. In concluding, it was decided that emergency assistance should be granted only in situations of critical need as determined by the provincial authorities. However, it was acknowledged that the termination of emergency assistance did not necessarily imply the end of displacement and did not entail discontinuing other forms of assistance, including support for implementing durable solutions and for strengthening protection and security. Under the circumstances, the date of 31 December 2002 will therefore be considered as being indicative only. This point was viewed by many participants as being the most significant achievement of the Workshop.

While appreciating this assessment, it remains to be seen how the Government will react to this new development and also in what way these qualifications would impinge on the notion of forced implementation implied in earlier policy statements.

ii. protection and security

It is commonly held that many of the IDPs would opt for return to their communities of origin. However, as violence and conflicts are continuing in several provinces, return may not always be a feasible option. For instance, it was suggested that IDPs from Aceh currently located North Sumatra would not consider return to their home communities because of continuing insecurity. Although many participants referred to security (and protection) concerns in the return process, it was difficult to obtain a clear picture of conditions in those areas presented in the case studies and the Workshop did not provide a strategy for dealing with situations of extended insecurity.

Evidently, in many situations the key to creating conditions would be a negotiated peace in the region or areas concerned. However, given the variable levels of conflict, and the pattern of relapses in certain areas, implementing returns may not be applicable for large numbers of IDPs, even if they wished to avail themselves of this option.

iii. reconciliation

Protection and security may be strengthened by introducing a variety of confidence building and reconciliation projects and schemes to facilitate dialogue between communities. Many Workshop participants referred to this as an essential dimension of durable peace and recovery. Additionally, it was suggested that the development of community-based projects in particular regions/districts could, in addition to addressing specific needs, be directed at reducing the perceived economic disparities which often fuel intercommunal conflict and violence. In the case of IDPs, such steps could facilitate community integration and diminish resentment towards the displaced.

iv. funding

All policy options, particularly the resettlement option require a wide range of activities to provide infrastructure and basic facilities for IDPs and also for their support pending self-sufficiency. The period required to establish populations, whether in agriculture or other employment activities will necessarily be lengthy. The sheer magnitude of the problem would involve substantial financial resources, additional to the significant contribution the Government is already making to respond to IDP needs. In this regard, the contribution from the international community is regarded as being indispensable for progress in achieving durable solutions. The increasing openness of the Government to collaborating with the United Nations, donors and other bodies may be regarded as a positive measure for mobilising additional resources. Certain participants at the Workshop also cited an overwhelming need on the part of the authorities to demonstrate this openness by strengthening the planning processes, showing increased efficiency, reduced corruption and improved capacity. In a separate discussion, the representative of the Asian Development Bank indicated that there was scope for funding from the Bank for IDP projects under certain conditions. The Mission suggested that the UNCT support the Banks' project identification/formulation process. Furthermore the IDP Unit is ready to build Bank capacity on IDPs and the idea of a Bank Internship in the Unit will be pursued.

v. administrative reform

The reform of the administrative structure, including the trend towards decentralization and processes related to autonomy for Aceh and Papua is still not fully consolidated. In discussions at the Workshop the provincial officials voiced their concerns about difficulties resulting from the processes including serious gaps in communication and coordination between the various governmental structures at different levels. It was also evident that they required more information about their functions in the reformed structures. In this respect the Workshop indeed provided a first opportunity for contact between Government officials dealing with IDPs countrywide and it was acknowledged that the exchanges were useful and indispensable for creating a better understanding of their roles and functions as well as of different aspects of the IDP issue." New policy for the management of IDPs (November 2001)

- In its new policy, the government will continue providing assistance to IDPs and Governors, as heads of Satkorlak PBP, will have full responsibility for IDP-related issues.
- Dep. Social Affairs provides food and shelter
- Dep. of Health provides medicine and health services
- Dep. of Housing and Regional Infrastructure provides emergency shelter, water, sanitation, building materials and infrastructure for relocation sites
- Dep. of Manpower and Transmigration provides construction aid and relocation facilities.
- Coordinating Minister for Social Affairs and People's Welfare assures overall coordination through BAKORNAS PBP
- New strategy involves: 1) returning IDPs to their place of origin; 2) Enable IDPs to settle in an existing community with GoRI assistance; 3) Resettle the IDPs in new locations, by insertion or local transmigration.
- Government hopes to solve IDP problem by the end of 2002. Aid agencies think it might take another year.

"In early October 2001, the GoRI made public a new policy for the management of IDP situations in Indonesia (see Annex 1 for full text). The GoRI reaffirmed its commitment to continue providing a wide range of assistance to IDPs, even though Governors, as Heads of the Executive Coordinating Unit for Disaster Management and the Handling of IDPs (SATKORLAK PBP), have full responsibility for managing IDP-related problems. Responsibilities for assistance are as follows: the Department of Social Affairs provides food and shelter assistance; the Department of Health medicine and health services; the Department of Housing and Regional Infrastructure emergency shelter, clean water, sanitation, building materials and infrastructure for relocation sites, and the Department of Manpower and Transmigration construction aid and relocation facilities in new residential sites, including allowance money. Other departments and offices provide similar programmes and activities. The Coordinating Minister for Social Affairs and People's Welfare assures overall coordination through the National Coordination Agency for Disaster Management and the Handling of IDPs (BAKORNAS PBP).

In order to resolve IDP problems, the GoRI proposed to follow three courses of action:

Return IDPs to their places of origin so that they can resume normal lives as before the conflict. This would require a willingness to do so on the part of the IDPs, and a readiness on the part of the local community to accept them back. The Government would provide facilities. Reconciliation would be a pre-requisite. The Department of Social Affairs and local governments are to take the lead.

Enable IDPs to settle in an existing community with GoRI assistance and facilities, including assistance to recover livelihood security. The State Ministry for Cooperatives and Small and Medium Enterprises, the Department of Manpower and Transmigration and local governments are to take the lead.

Resettle the IDPs in new locations, by insertion or local transmigration. This option is costly as it requires clearing land, building houses and public facilities, providing farming tools and equipment, as well as an allowance and assistance for a guaranteed period of time. The Department of Manpower and Transmigration, the Department of Housing and Regional Infrastructure and local governments are to take the lead.

The GoRI hopes to complete the implementation of the above strategies by the end of December 2002. International agencies involved in the provision of humanitarian assistance are of the view that this timetable is overly optimistic and that solving IDP crises with due respect for humanitarian principles will take at least another year. The UN Humanitarian Coordinator, on behalf of UN agencies, will take the lead in discussing with the Government its proposed policy." (OCHA 26 November 2001)

Coordination

Government's IDP management board (Bakornas PBP) in charge of responding to the IDP emergency (February 2003)

- Bakornas PBP is the government agency in charge of responding to the needs of IDPs.
- OCHA, through the HC and WFP, liaises with government, UN agencies, INGOs and donors.

"The GoRI, through their disaster and IDP management board (Bakornas PBP), take responsibility for responding to the complex emergencies throughout the country. It also works directly through several of the line ministries relevant to their sectoral responsibilities. All assistance is provided at the request of the GoRI and is designed to complement and enhance their capacity, and that of civil society, in all humanitarian activities.

OCHA, through the HC, and WFP (for food aid coordination) take responsibility for ensuring effective liaison and joint response with Government, other UN agencies, International NGOs (INGOs), and humanitarian donors. The relationship between the GoRI and the international humanitarian assistance organisations is based on a strong, positive partnership and will be further improved during 2003 through a number of direct activities aimed at strengthening mitigation, preparedness and response capacity to the multiple crises." (OCHA 14 February 2003, p. 10)

FAO to establish a coordination unit for humanitarian programmes in the agricultural sector (2004)

FAO will from April to December 2004 facilitate and coordinate agriculture related activities to assist vulnerable populations in Indonesia:

Project title: Support to the Coordination of Emergency, Rehabilitation and Livelihood Recovery Assistance in the Agriculture Sector

"Objectives:

Facilitate and coordinate agriculture related activities to assist vulnerable populations in disaster-affected areas in Indonesia.

Provide access to crucial technical knowledge and data to strengthen the impact and efficiency of ongoing and planned agriculture sector project activities.

Support the transition from emergency relief to sustainable rehabilitation and development in the agriculture sector.

Targeted Beneficiaries: IDPs, returnees and other crisis-affected vulnerable groups within rural communities." (OCHA 9 April 2004, p. 36)

For more details on this project, see the UN Consolidated Appeal 2004, OCHA, 9 April 2004, p. 36)

Responsibility for UN Project Coordination Offices in all conflict-affected regions to be handed over to UNDP in 2004

- OCHA will continue during 2004 to act as coordinator of the humanitarian assistance between the humanitarian partners and the government and advocate for the displaced.
- OCHA plans to phase down its field presence in 2004 and to hand over responsibility of the UN Project Coordination Offices in Maluku and Central Sulawesi to UNDP

"In recognition of the positive developments in North Maluku, OCHA has handed over the responsibility for the management of the United Nations Project Coordination Office (UNPCO) to UNDP on 1 January 2003 to ensure that concerted efforts are made to support government post-conflict recovery and development programmes in the province. In Central Sulawesi and Maluku, where positive developments have encouraged assistance providers to shift the focus from relief to sustainable recovery, the management of the UNPCOs will also be handed over to UNDP in mid-2004 so that UNDP takes the lead in supporting and coordinating development actors in those provinces. Subject to developments in the overall humanitarian environment, OCHA is planning to phase down its presence in Indonesia towards the end of 2004.

While Central Sulawesi, Maluku and North Maluku are moving towards recovery, Aceh remains in special circumstances during the state of military emergency. OCHA will continue to advocate for a comprehensive effort to ensure that the most vulnerable among the displaced and the affected communities receive the necessary assistance as well as fair and equal treatment. OCHA remains committed to support the GoRI and the humanitarian actors to ensure that humanitarian programmes support recovery and longer-term development while taking into consideration the protection of the rights of the vulnerable population." (OCHA 9 April 2004, p. 13)

"United Nations Project Coordination Offices (UNPCOs) have been established in four conflict affected regions to better coordinate humanitarian activities and facilitate interaction between international agencies and local authorities. In the context of the shift in North Maluku from a humanitarian phase to a post-conflict recovery phase, administrative responsibility for the UNPCO shifted from OCHA to UNDP at the beginning of 2003, with continued use and management of the facility by UN development agencies with ongoing programmes in the province.

The overall objective of the UNPCO in Ternate is to facilitate the implementation of UN programmes and projects in North Maluku in support of government programmes, and to assist UN agencies achieve their respective mandates and objectives in North Maluku, through the provision of common resources and services. Specific objectives of the Centre are: common logistical and administrative services; improved information and data resources; enhanced inter-agency collaboration and coordination in support of government programmes.

As the humanitarian situation continues to improve, OCHA is planning to phase down its presence in the field towards the end of the 2004, subject to the developments in the overall humanitarian situation. It is expected that the management of the UNPCOs in Central Sulawesi and Maluku will be handed over to UNDP towards the middle of the year. This project has been designed in close collaboration with OCHA to ensure the smooth handover of management of UNPCOs in Central Sulawesi and Maluku to UNDP from July 2004. OCHA is appealing for funds to cover the operational costs of the UNPCOs in Central Sulawesi and Maluku until the end of June 2004 under a separate project, while the financial resources requested for this project are intended to support the relevant costs from July to the end of the year, in addition to the costs for the operation of the UNPCO in Ternate for the full year." Dissemination of the Guiding Principles: "GoRI involvement in the planning process has created greater space for advocating better practice in public service provision, increasing social service expenditure, and incorporating rights-based approaches into public policy. An example of this is the unanimous endorsement of the Guiding Principles on Internal Displacement by provincial governments affected by conflict." (OCHA, 14 February 2003, p. 10)

Seminar on Internal Displacement in Indonesia: The Brookings-CUNY Project, in collaboration with the Center for Research on Inter-Group Relations and Conflict Resolution (CERIC), the National Commission on Human Rights (KomnasHAM), OCHA, UNDP and UNHCR, held a seminar in Jakarta, Indonesia to raise visibility to the problem of internal displacement and identify ways of improving the national and international response. More than 130 persons participated (some 30 participants came from 10 of the most affected provinces) from government offices, international organizations, local and international NGOs and research institutions. Participants expressed support for the establishment of a

Training on the Guiding Principles

NRC training workshop: The Global IDP Project of the Norwegian Refugee Council (NRC) together with CARDI held a training workshop on the Guiding Principles in Jakarta, Indonesia. In Indonesia, NRC provides support to internally displaced persons through a consortium comprised of the Danish Refugee Council, the International Rescue Committee and Stichting Vluchteling: the Consortium for Assistance to Refugees and Displaced in Indonesia (CARDI). The consortium strives to include protection aspects in its programme, and felt a need to better understand the concept of protection as such, as well as the potential use of the Guiding Principles in such protection work. CARDI and the Global IDP Project therefore invited a number of humanitarian NGOs to discuss protection and the Guiding Principles in a structured workshop addressing questions such as what is protection, which are the different ways of doing it and how can we better include protection concerns in our relief programmes.

IOM training activities: "Building on its participation in the OCHA IDP Unit, IOM has begun a partnership with Depkeh & HAM on training in the Guiding Principles and protection assessment and monitoring, and development of reconciliation strategies. Based on the results of an initial regional workshop held in Surabaya in 2002, IOM and Depkeh & HAM have developed a capacity building programme with the aim of establishing systematic protection monitoring and response. The programme will address the protection climate in both the area of displacement as well as that of origin, the latter through identification of root causes of conflict and development of strategies contributing to reconciliation and eventual return.

Main activities include:

- Training of trainers for 12 Depkeh & HAM officials in Guiding Principles dissemination;
- Training of 24 Depkeh & HAM officials in protection assessment and monitoring;
- Six regional workshops on Guiding Principles & protection monitoring including practical work to assess situation of IDPs in workshop location and causes of displacement;
- Placement of 12 Depkeh & HAM officials from Jakarta to the field to work with government, NGOs and communities in strengthening protection monitoring and response;
- Based on regional workshop results, implementation of activities (such as facilitated focus group discussions) to assist in developing reconciliation strategies in five areas of conflict and displacement."

(OCHA 14 February 2003, p.76)

Achievements during 2003

A total of 164 officials from Depkeh & Ham[Department of Justice and Human Rights] (Central and Provincial), Satkorlack, the Police and Bakornas have participated in the Guiding Principles dissemination workshops conducted in five provinces. 68 of those have attended the protection monitoring workshop and have actively participated in the funded field placements. The monitoring and reporting mechanisms that will eventually be institutionalised by Depkeh & HAM are being developed during the field placements. By project completion, Depkeh & HAM's capacity to appraise, monitor and report on the protection status of IDPs will have been strengthened, there by contributing to the overall protection climate." Training on the Guiding Principles on Internal Displacement to improve the management skills of SATKORLAK PBP and SATLAK PBP in Aceh

"The IDP Management Training was officially inaugurated on Thursday (25 Mar.) by the Secretary of SATKORLAK PBP and the Head of UN OCHA Aceh. The training is designed by an LNGO, Yayasan Sihat Beurata, in consultation with provincial authorities and UN agencies (i.e. UNICEF, WHO, WFP, and OCHA) to improve the management skills of SATKORLAK PBP and SATLAK PBP in dealing with the IDP issues and disaster management in the province. The training is also covering topics on protection issues (i.e. the rights of IDPs and civilians in armed conflicts) and the Government's responsibilities. This is a two days training and will be conducted in three sessions/rounds consecutively. Some 150 participants from Banda Aceh and other affected districts are attending the training that is funded by the (DFID/AUSAID) Emergency Response Fund/Humanitarian Response Fund." International response to internal displacement in Indonesia

Australia is by far the main financial contributor to the UN Consolidated Appeal 2004 (July 2004)

- Australia has contributed 10 million dollars to the UN Consolidated Appeal 2004. The funds will be used to meet humanitarian needs
- Since 1998, Australia has provided over 145 million dollars in humanitarian aid to Indonesia.
- The focus of the assistance will be on building stronger health, education, nutritional and conflict prevention programs in Maluku, West Timor and Central Sulawesi.
- OCHA's presence in Indonesia will be assured throughout 2004 with additional Australian funding.

For an overview of the current financial status of the Consolidated Appeal, see:

Indonesia 2004 Consolidated Appeal, Financial Tracking system, OCHA

"(...) Australia will provide $10 million to help meet humanitarian needs in Indonesia within the framework of the United Nations Consolidated Appeal 2004. This is a further example of Australia's commitment to assisting Indonesia.

Australia has provided more than $145 million in humanitarian aid to Indonesia since 1998. Indonesia remains vulnerable to natural disasters and inter-communal conflict.

Working with international non-government and United Nations organisations, our assistance responds to immediate humanitarian needs, addresses the underlying causes of conflict and fosters social cohesion.

In partnership with a small number of key humanitarian agencies, we will focus on building stronger health, education, nutritional and conflict prevention programs in Maluku, West Timor and Central Sulawesi.

Following recent outbreaks of avian influenza and dengue fever, as well as the regional outbreak of SARS in 2003, Australia will work with the World Health Organisation to build a more integrated communicable disease surveillance and control program in Indonesia.

New assistance will be provided to the Indonesian Red Cross to strengthen its disaster prevention and mitigation role. We will continue to support the Indonesia delegation of the International Committee of the Red Cross for post-conflict support programs.

The continued presence in Indonesia of the United Nations Office for the Coordination of Humanitarian Affairs will be assured throughout 2004 with additional Australian funding. This will include contingency funding for international NGOs to enable them to respond rapidly and effectively to emergencies.

Conflict and disease are significant contributors to poverty. By supporting programs that address these issues, Australia is helping create an environment for economic growth and development in Indonesia and promoting longer-term peace and stability." (Government of Australia 2 July 2004)

Australia and UK establish two funds to help assist IDPs in Indonesia (2003-2004)

- Emergency Response Fund (ERF) and Humanitarian Response Fund (HRF) have been established by contributions from Australia and the United Kingdom in 2003.
- Both funds have been managed by OCHA to support international and local NGOs to respond to the needs of IDPs and people affected by conflicts and natural disasters in Aceh, Central Sulawesi, Java, Maluku, West Timor and West Kalimantan.
- Since 2003, OCHA has disbursed some USD 800,000 from the ERF and some USD 600,000 from the HRF, to enable 15 NGOs to implement 24 projects.

"OCHA has been managing the Emergency Response Fund (ERF) and the Humanitarian Response Fund (HRF) established with the contributions from the Governments of the United Kingdom (GBP750,000) and Australia (AUD 1million) respectively. Both Funds have been disbursed to assist international and local NGOs to respond to the needs of the Internally Displaced Persons (IDPs) and people affected by conflicts and natural disasters in Aceh, Central Sulawesi, Java, Maluku, West Timor and West Kalimantan. Since 2003, OCHA has disbursed some USD 800,000 from the ERF and some USD 600,000 from the HRF, to enable 15 NGOs to implement 24 projects. Activities carried out under these projects include a provision of health/medical services, distribution of food and non-food items, rehabilitation and maintenance of water/sanitation facilities, provision of income-generation activities and organisation of workshops/seminars on the rights and issues related to the IDPs. In the month of May, the following projects have been approved: 1) Psychosocial Assistance, Training and Health Services (PATHS) for Conflict-Affected Communities (Health project) by International Medical Corps (IMC) for Central Sulawesi and 2) Mercy Corps Response to Civil Unrest in Maluku (Multi-sectoral assistance)." (OCHA 1 June 2004)

IOM to strengthen humanitarian protection and reconciliation through institution building (2004)

IOM will during 2004 conduct a one-year project aimed at contributing to address the protection needs of IDPs in or from 4 provinces:

Project title: Strengthening Humanitarian Protection and Reconciliation through Institution Building

Objective: To contribute to addressing protection needs and promoting reconciliation through strengthening the Department of Justice and Human Rights' capacity and role in protection assessment and monitoring.

Targeted Beneficiaries: Direct: Department of Justice and Human Rights officials from Jakarta and four provinces; SATKORLAK officials from from provinces.

Indirect: IDP population in or from four provinces." (OCHA 9 April 2004, p. 38)

For more details on this project, see UN Consolidated Appeal 2004, OCHA, 9 April 2004, p. 38)

Achievements of the Consolidated Appeal projects during 2003

- CA for 2003 sought donor support for a strategy and programmes aimed at supporting mitigation and prevention of conflict efforts by government, communities, and local institutions.
- WFP has addressed the food needs of 1.8 million people (urban poor and IDPs).
- In Central Sulawesi, Maluku and North Maluku UN agencies and NGOs have been able to support reconstruction and rehabilitation efforts in many sectors.
- In West Kalimantan, collaboration between the local government IOM and international NGOs, have improved the general living conditions especially in relocation sites.
- In Central Sulawesi, direct assistance in the form of food, shelter, agriculture, water and sanitation, social support and start-up capital has helped 13,000 households rebuild their livelihoods.
- In Maluku, UN and NGO efforts have promoted reconciliation, peace-building and economic empowerment, improved public services, developed infrastructure, and enabled IDPs to return.

"In view of the relatively positive trend observed in 2002, the CA for 2003 sought donor support for a strategy and programmes aimed at supporting mitigation and prevention of conflict efforts by government, communities, and local institutions. This was done by enhancing recovery programmes, developing sustainable livelihood solutions and supporting peace-building initiatives. The strategic goals in the CA for 2003 were relatively broad and long-term in nature, and their achievement required multi-year and multi-sector activities. However, the degree and magnitude of progress varies from region to region. In Aceh the Government is providing data as a basis for monitoring since restricted access of international humanitarian actors has made it difficult to measure achievements directly. For this reason, most of the UN and INGO projects in the province have been postponed.

The relatively positive response in 2003 enabled several humanitarian agencies to start implementing activities in safer areas where access had improved. Support through and outside the framework of the CA has allowed these agencies and their government counterparts to make marked progress in pursuing the strategic goals outlined in the Appeal (for details, see Annex E-A).

In particular, through its programme supporting IDPs and the urban poor, WFP was able to address the food and nutritional needs of 1.8 million beneficiaries in various parts of the country (Goal 3).

In Central Sulawesi, Maluku and North Maluku, the Food and Agriculture Organization (FAO), the United Nations Development Programme (UNDP), the United Nations Population Fund (UNFPA), UNICEF, WFP, the World Health Organization (WHO) and several international NGOs supported the reconstruction of houses, the rehabilitation of the agriculture and fishery sectors, the rehabilitation of basic infrastructure and social services facilities, economic recovery, and a return to normality in the communities. Many schools and health centres were rehabilitated and provided with essential supplies and equipment. Capacity building and technical support enhanced service delivery at local level, improved income generation for fishermen and farming communities, improved school attendance and upgraded the skills of health workers, teachers and other key government employees (Goals 1-4).

In West Kalimantan, close collaboration between the local government, the International Organization for Migration (IOM), and international NGOs (Catholic Relief Services [CRS], Save the Children-United Kingdom [SC UK], International Medical Corps [IMC], and World Vision International [WVI]), have led to further improvement in agricultural activities, health and hygiene practices, health monitoring systems and public infrastructure, especially in relocation sites. Settlers in relocation sites have also received food items (WFP), water tanks and clean water facilities, access to health centres, safe play areas for children, and basic skills and vocational training (Goals 1-5).

In Central Sulawesi, significant direct assistance in the form of food, shelter, agriculture, water and sanitation, social support and start-up capital has helped 13,000 households rebuild their livelihoods. Cooperative for American Relief Everywhere (CARE) and Church World Services (CWS) complemented government efforts by providing food, non-food items (NFIs) and shelter materials to thousands of destitute persons. CARE provided emergency and transitional agricultural support, and rehabilitated water and sanitation systems. Mercy Corps (MC) worked with local partners to ensure that essential services met minimum standards. IMC provided direct support to primary health services and public health awareness.

In Maluku, UNDP's recovery programme, together with assistance provided by the government, other UN agencies and NGOs (MC, SC UK, Consortium for Assistance to Refugees and the Displaced in Indonesia [CARDI], International Catholic Migration Commission [ICMC], IMC) have promoted reconciliation, peace-building and economic empowerment, improved public services, developed infrastructure, and enabled IDPs to return. A total of 19,500 houses for IDPs were rehabilitated and some 130,000 IDPs were able to return to their home areas (Goals 1-5).

Significant progress was recorded in West Timor as 225,000 East Timorese refugees have been able to return since October 1999 to Timor Leste (formerly East Timor) spontaneously and with assistance from GoRI, the United Nations High Commission for Refugees (UNHCR), IOM, and NGOs. The remaining 28,000 former refugees are civil servants, police and military personnel and their dependents, and farmers who mainly reside in camps in Belu and Kupang districts, while some have opted for housing made available by the government elsewhere in the province." (OCHA 9 April 2004, pp. 4-5)

Conclusions and recommendations following a Bakornas-OCHA workshop on management of IDPs (June 2003)

- The reconciliation process is an essential component of the resolution of the IDP problem. All stakeholders must be included in the process, including community leaders, religious and adat leaders as well as parties to the conflict.
- Strengthening of the role of law, order and security will help lesson rumours and suspicion from spiralling out of control leading to violence.

- Certification and recovery of land and ownership rights is a problem requiring urgent attention. Special committees dealing with the problem of land and property ownership claims must be made operational. Housing allowances must be harmonized.
- Coordination needs to be strengthened between the various levels of government and across provincial boundaries.
- Programmes need to focus on both IDPs and surrounding affected communities to prevent growing antagonisms based on jealousies over privileged assistance. There should be a greater emphasis on budget support for infrastructure development, the strengthening of local basic services and supporting the development of the private sector. Reconciliation strategies need to be integrated into long-term policy and programme development.
- There is a need for more accurate data on the displaced to be able to better target assistance.

Listed below are the main conclusions and recommendations of a workshop on management of IDPs jointly organized by Bakornas PBP and OCHA and held in June 2003.

Reconciliation

It is recognised that reconciliation is an essential component in the full resolution of the IDP problem. The process of reconciliation needs to be continued with greater involvement of all stakeholders including community leaders, religious and adat leaders as well as by those directly involved in the conflict. The involvement of communities more closely and actively in the process of reconciliation will empower them to find their own solutions to future crises and tension. The particular problem of assisting the recovery of those traumatised by the conflict especially needs greater attention. Programmes need to be implemented that encourage people to live peacefully with one another, be tolerant of differences and respect the rights of others. More has to be done than simply providing material and technical assistance; cross-communal activities need to be encouraged, and mind-sets need to be turned towards resolving differences peacefully.

Protection and Security

The application and strengthening of the role of law, order and security will help lessen rumours and suspicion from spiralling out of control leading to violence. In several situations such as Central Sulawesi and Maluku security forces will still be needed until the situation becomes safer. New policies and support is required from the government to develop independent, local security systems to fulfil the security role prior to the withdrawal of specialist TNI and Police Mobile Brigade forces. In several areas community leaders have already assumed the responsibility for security.

Land, Property Rights and Housing

The certification and recovery of land and ownership rights is a problem requiring urgent attention. The establishment of a special committee to deal with the problem of land and property ownership claims in areas affected by conflict has been mooted, but requires a Presidential Decree to authorise its formation and functions.

Limited funding from the Central Government for house reconstruction has restricted the rebuilding programme. Further external assistance will be required. The variation of allocation and construction types of housing was noted between provinces and in some instances within the same province but no recommendations for changing the current approach were agreed to.

Coordination and Information

Coordination needs to be strengthened between the various levels of government and across provincial boundaries. Coordination between UN and INGOs and the various levels of government also needs further attention and improvement.

It is essential that Central Government, including Bakornas PBP are more responsive to needs in provincial areas and take a pro-active role in ensuring the proper management of data and standards of assistance are met at the provincial and municipal levels. In acknowledging that there are significant variations in types and quantities of assistance between, but also within, provinces, national Procedural Standards in the Handling of IDPs were advocated by some participants. To advance this it was suggested Bakornas PBP compile a database on Operational Procedures and Standards and design appropriate activities for their implementation, including the training of staff from local authorities.

In accordance with Presidential Decree No. 3/2001 local Satkorlak PBP must be resourced to adequate levels, this includes the authority to obtain, use and develop resources at provincial levels. Provincial and local governments require instructions on the handling of IDPs from the Department of Home Affairs to better improve local mechanisms.

All delegates agreed that there is significant scope for engaging more actively with community and religious leaders, civil society groups and local NGOs in the development of strategies, which have the potential to widen and build on the reconciliation process.

Longer Term Planning and Recovery

Programmes need to focus on both IDPs and surrounding affected communities to prevent growing antagonisms based on jealousies over privileged assistance. An area approach will also aid a more holistic strategy of reconciliation and reintegration of divided communities. Assistance should also focus on the needs of those affected by the communal strife but chose not to flee. There should now be a greater emphasis on budget support for infrastructure development, the strengthening of local basic services and supporting the development of the private sector. Follow-up support is also needed in resettlement communities or those areas where people have recently returned such as in West Kalimantan and Sulawesi Tenggara to ensure even development with the surrounding area, reducing alienation of ex-IDPs, and ensuring that basic services are met.

To prevent the emergence of new conflicts arising ongoing attention to security and law and order are essential. Reconciliation strategies need to be integrated into long-term policy and programme development: funds have to be adequately applied to such strategies including the implementation and resourcing of effective prevention, mitigation and response and early warning systems. These processes must be ongoing and permanent.

Data Collection

Common and agreed data are important for central budgeting, efficient planning and prioritising those areas most in need with adequate and appropriate resources. The overall figure of IDPs in Indonesia of 740,000 as determined during the joint Bakornas PBP/ OCHA missions, appears to be in the right order of magnitude, although in some cases provincial and district level data varied and hence requires more rigorous attention. Data should always be disaggregated by gender and age to enhance planning and response.

RECOMMENDATIONS

1. Humanitarian assistance should be oriented towards longer-term solutions rather than simply looking at extending existing projects and programmes.

2. Central Government policy should now:

Have a greater strategic focus

Tackle the root causes behind the conflict and seek integrated solutions to the problems caused by the conflicts

Cooperate closely with local governments

Focus resources on those IDPs still suffering severe hardship especially those remaining in barrack accommodation

The rights of IDPs has to be protected and the Guiding Principles on Internal Displacement should be implemented to the extent possible in all programme and project development

Reconciliation

3. The process of reconciliation needs to be continued with greater involvement of all stakeholders including community leaders, religious and adat leaders as well as by those directly involved in the conflict.
4. Those traumatised by the conflict need the proper professional support to help them overcome the problems of mental trauma.
5. Programmes need to be implemented that encourage people to live peacefully with one another, be tolerant of differences and respect the rights of others; and cross-communal activities that promote peaceful reintegration of divided communities need to be encouraged where possible.

Protection and Security

6. The integration of Siskamling units at the sub-district level should receive budgetary support from the district and municipal authorities.
7. Government, NGOs and UN partners need to actively advocate for, and develop socialisation programmes, to raise awareness of the importance of equal respect and rights for all religious and ethnic groups in Indonesia, especially in those areas where violence has occurred or the potential for violence exists.

Land, Property Rights and Housing

8. A special committee should be established to deal with problems of land ownership and certification and the recovery of abandoned or surrendered property. This committee should include representatives of the Department of Justice and Human Rights, since the preservation and protection of property rights is an essential component of their mandate. (This committee can only be established and provided with necessary powers by Presidential Decree.)

Coordination and Information

9. Coordination mechanisms need to be strengthened between provinces and between the various tiers of government, including government coordination with UN and international humanitarian organisations.
10. In accordance with Presidential Decree No. 3/2001 local Satkorlak PBP must be properly resourced to effectively conduct their functions.
11. Bakornas PBP should compile a database on Operational Procedures and Standards for the Handling of IDPs for consideration in formalising in Indonesian Government regulations. The design and implementation of training in the application of developed Standards is also an appropriate role for Bakornas PBP. Likewise, the Department of Home Affairs is required to issue instructions to regional authorities in the application of developed Operational Procedures and Standards.
12. Bakornas PBP has an important role to play in the development of more accurate and applicable data systems, and as such should work closely and pro-actively with local governments to further improve the collection and management of data.

Longer Term Planning and Recovery

13. Programmes need to focus on IDPs and surrounding affected communities as well as communities affected by communal strife, but who did not flee.

14. There should now be a greater emphasis on budget support for infrastructure development, the strengthening of local basic services and supporting the development of the private sector. Follow-up support is also needed in resettlement communities or those areas where people have recently returned.

15. Reconciliation strategies need to be integrated into long-term policy and programme development: funds have to be adequately applied to such strategies including the implementation and resourcing of effective prevention, mitigation and response and early warning systems." (Bakornas PBP & OCHA July 2003, pp. 27-30)

OCHA's IDP Unit visits Indonesia to discuss government's IDP policy (June 2002)

- An IDP Policy Workshop was held in May 2002, bringing together government officials and members of the OCHA IDP Unit

"The Internal Displacement Unit undertook a mission to Indonesia from 19 to 26 May 2002 to carry farther discussions with the Government and Country Team (CT) on the formulation and implementation of the Government's IDP policy. Since the Unit's earlier mission in October 2001, contacts had continued with the OCHA office and the CT to engage the Government on the scope and modalities of implementation of its policy announced in September 2001. Consultations also focussed on the parameters and timing of a proposed Network assessment mission to Indonesia postponed from 2001. The Government's invitation to participate in an IDP Policy Workshop provided the opportunity to examine these issues with senior government officials and with other interested parties." (OCHA IDP Unit June 2002, p. 1)

Conclusions and recommendations following the IDP Unit's visit to Indonesia (June 2002)

- The real timeframe for implementing durable solutions for IDPs should be based on the conditions for identifying and executing suitable solutions.
- In order to provide a stronger basis for formulating protection and assistance support for IDPs it is necessary to develop and consolidate reliable data on the IDPs, starting perhaps from a comprehensive registration exercise.
- It is necessary to devise confidence-building measures and reconciliation projects and schemes to address the root causes of displacement.
- An IDP assessment mission could take place in September/October.

"Conclusion and Recommendations"

1. The growing rapprochement and constructive dialogue between the Government and the international community, reflected even in the organisation of the Policy Workshop, is truly remarkable. In the long run this development should be harnessed to strengthen protection and assistance to IDPs and their communities.

2. The Government's interest in accelerating the implementation of solutions for the IDPs is commendable. The way to achieving these solutions is however replete with obstacles which the Workshop revealed to the Government and other participants. In particular the flexibility required in terms of the timeframe for implementing solutions as determined by the Workshop should be scrupulously maintained. At the same time, while also appreciating the reasons for the Government's desire to cut back on emergency assistance to long-standing IDP groups, the Workshop urged that the cut-off decisions should be based on careful scrutiny of the specific conditions of the IDPs. Furthermore, the mission urges that implementing cut-offs should only be applied once a durable solution for the group has been identified. Therefore the real timeframe for implementing durable solutions for IDPs should be based on the conditions for identifying and executing suitable solutions.

3. As the Government inches forward towards implementing durable solutions for IDPs, these efforts should not overshadow the nature and conditions of IDPs in various parts of the country where conflict and tensions continue. In particular, it is necessary to clarify the security and protection conditions of the IDPs in many provinces. The mission strongly recommends that further steps be taken to explore ways of monitoring the protection situation of the IDPs countrywide. In order to provide a stronger basis for formulating protection and assistance support for IDPs it is necessary to develop and consolidate reliable data on the IDPs, starting perhaps from a comprehensive registration exercise.

4. Although considerable progress has been achieved, sustainable peace and stability for the IDPs cannot be attained without addressing in some ways, the root causes of displacement, the intercommunal violence and conflict. It is in this context that it is necessary to devise confidence-building measures and reconciliation projects and schemes, such as the Government has initiated through the two Malino agreements respectively for Central Sulawesi and for Maluku. Further progress in this area could also strengthen protection and security of all communities. Community-based development projects may also contribute hugely to reducing the economic and social disparities which generate conflict.

5. The Workshop provided an excellent opportunity for the Unit to examine its inputs for supporting the Government and the UN CT and the wider group of humanitarian actors dealing with IDPs. The Unit will, in collaboration with OCHA and IOM Jakarta, conduct a training event in Indonesia from 17-19 June 2002.

6. Regarding the fielding of an IDP assessment mission, discussions with the Government officials concluded that it would be preferable to support the Government effort to formulate and implement solutions for IDPs. It was therefore agreed that the dialogue continues on formulating the framework for such a mission, which could take place in the fall (September/October) 2002." (OCHA IDP Unit June 2002, pp. 5-6)

The project will target 300,000 IDPs/returnees and host communities, operating mainly through international NGOs, such as CWS, CRS, CARE and WV, as well as local NGO partners. Food assistance will focus on Madura, Central Sulawesi, Maluku, West Kalimantan, and West Timor.

"Project Title: Assistance to IDPs

Objective: Support empowerment of conflict-affected communities where IDPs have returned or resettled; and to meet critical food gaps of IDPs and returnees not covered by government programmes.

Targeted Beneficiaries: IDPs/returnees/host communities up to 300,000 persons per month." (UNOCHA 9 April 2004, p. 46)

For more details on this program, see the Consolidated Appeal 2004, OCHA 9 April p.46

FAO supports income-generating projects for conflict-affected communities (2004)

FAO will between April and December 2004 conduct an agriculture project benefiting IDPs/returnees and conflict-affected populations in Indonesia by supporting local initiatives that provide income-generating opportunities in the fishing and agriculture sector. CARDI's operations on behalf of IDPs in Indonesia (August 2003)

- CARDI operates programs in education, environmental health, micro-grants to local partners, income-generation, infrastructure rehabilitation and information dissemination.

- In Aceh CARDI operates a water & sanitation as well as an economic recovery programme. Given the military operation underway and the restrictions imposed by martial law, most programmes have been suspended.
- In North Sulawesi, CARDI conducts "Go and see visits" aimed at providing information to displaced persons on conditions for return to North Maluku. It also supports primary education, vocational training, and life skills through peer education and peace education for IDP children in camps.
- In North Maluku, CARDI supports the process of return and resettlement through provision of hygienic water and sanitation facilities.
- In Maluku province, CARDI runs a micro-grants program supporting small-scale projects submitted by local NGOs focusing on the Ambon and Seram islands. In addition, it also runs an emergency education program in IDP camps in Ambon.

"CARDI (Consortium for Assistance to Refugees and the Displaced in Indonesia) operates programs in education, environmental health, micro-grants to local partners, income-generation, infrastructure rehabilitation and information dissemination.

In Aceh Province, CARDI has provided water and sanitation facilities in internally displaced person camps. In the last year, activities have shifted to rehabilitating water and sanitation sites in villages of return, together with distribution of family household supplies and hygiene kits. Sustainable livelihood projects assist returned families and communities to re-establish themselves economically. A micro-grants project, started in 2002, allows communities to choose how CARDI can assist through grants that allow people to invest in their future.

As a result of renewed Aceh military operations, the Indonesian government has severely restricted access to the province. Most program activities have therefore been temporarily suspended, though CARDI is committed to maintaining its presence and programming in Aceh.

In North Sulawesi, internally displaced people fleeing Muslim-Christian conflict in North Maluku live in crowded and difficult conditions in government centers. CARDI programs for internally displaced children residing in camps support primary education, vocational training, and life skills through peer education and peace education. One project provides information to displaced persons on conditions for return to North Maluku through "Go and see visits." CARDI accompanies displaced person representatives to their home districts to meet former neighbors and assess conditions for return. This information is fed back through camps via bulletins distributed to the entire displaced community. The Media Campaign Project further disseminates information on return conditions through radio and television.

CARDI supports the process of return and resettlement in North Maluku through provision of hygienic water and sanitation facilities. For youth, CARDI established the Youth Civic Participation Initiative, where sixty Peer Educators foster a sense of normalcy and direction. CARDI has assisted in school building rehabilitation to meet the need of returnees and resettled individuals. A micro-grants program supports projects in water and sanitation, income generation, infrastructure rehabilitation, information bulletins and peace and reconciliation activities. For all projects, priority is given to communities where displaced persons are returning.

In Maluku, a micro-grants program supports small-scale projects submitted by local NGOs focusing on the Ambon and Seram islands. An emergency education program started in Ambon internally displaced camps is aimed at improving access for 5,000 displaced children and adolescents to primary education, non-formal education vocational training, life skills, conflict resolution, and recreational activities. The program expands local school capacity to absorb these displaced children and adolescents. The Ambon program also supports community child welfare committees and rehabilitates local primary schools." (IRC August 2003)

National response to internal displacement in Maluku province

Government to rehabilitate 37,000 houses in the Maluku (June 2004)

"According to Antara News Agency, Minister for Social Affairs Bachtiar Chamsyah declared that the Indonesian government will soon rehabilitate 37,115 houses that have been damaged or burned during the conflict since 1999. He said the government had allocated hundreds of billion rupiahs for the project so that those who had been displaced as refugees could immediately live and work normally in their own homes. State minister for Accelerated Development of Eastern Provinces Manuel Kaisiepo said the government had budgeted one trillion Rupiahs for social and infrastructural rehabilitation projects in the Moluccas, and 650 billion rupiahs for the North Moluccas." (CCDA 4 June 2004)

Government allocates nearly USD 4 million to the rehabilitation needs of the newly displaced (June 2004)

- New round of violence in Ambon displaced between 4,000 and 10,000 people in April 2004.
- IDR 33 billion (USD 3.8 million) has been allocated by the central government to address the immediate needs of IDPs and rehabilitation of damaged infrastructure.
- Several international NGOs and ICRC/PMI also provided emergency food, non-food and medical assistance to the conflict affected population.

"The violence left 40 people dead and over 300 people injured. Several bombs exploded in public places while police defused a number of unexploded bombs. Muslim and Christian communities have drawn invisible demarcation lines dividing Ambon city along the religious lines. The Government has reported some 10,000 newly displaced people while the Indonesian Red Cross (PMI) put this number at 4,000 IDPs. Many of these people have been displaced for a number of times and lost their belongings time and again, and will continue relying on the assistance programmes for some time to come. According to Maluku Governor's report to Jakarta, at least 847 housing units (589 unit belonging to recent returnees) and 4 schools including a UNDP funded reconciliation school were destroyed or badly damaged. The central government has already allocated IDR 33 billion (USD 3.8 million) to address the immediate needs of IDPs and rehabilitation of damaged infrastructure. Several international NGOs and ICRC/PMI also provided emergency food, non-food and medical assistance to the conflict affected population.

A team of UN Field Security Unit (FSU), Jakarta is visiting Ambon since 27 May 2004, to evaluate the situation particularly for a possible return of UN staff and resumption of activities. The visiting FSU team recommended the return of 68 UN staff and their immediate family members relocated in Jakarta since the end of April. Staff members are expected to return by first week of June. Office equipment, records and belongings of OCHA, UNICEF, WHO, UNDP, and UNSECOORD accommodated in the UN Project Coordination Office (UNPCO) have been destroyed at the onset of the recent conflict. Therefore, full and immediate resumption of UN activities will be difficult and staff may face additional difficulties to access the divided communities. MSF-B remained in the city throughout the troubled period while other INGOs, namely SC-UK, CARDI, JRS, ICMC, IMC and Mercy Corps, relocated their staff temporarily but have now resumed their activities in the province." Lack of funds, unreliable IDP data and lack of access to land compound the resolution of the IDP problem in Maluku (July 2003)

- A special working coordination group (Pokja) is operational in the province to assist in the resolution of the crisis
- Assistance packages had only been received by 10,000 families as at the end of 2002 from the total estimate of 64,000 families entitled to assistance.
- 202,800 IDPs/ 39,000 families remain displaced in Maluku province. Creating accurate data sets and eligibility criteria for assistance are now major priorities for the Pokja
- Provincial Government has recently established a Unit in charge of solving the IDP problems (POSKO)
- Three Governmental institutions responsible for construction of houses and/or provision of materials for housing in the villages of IDPs' origin and resettlement/relocation sites: Dinas PU; Dinas Social; and Dinas Nakertrans.

"In 1999 the Maluku Governor established a special working coordination group (Pokja) to assist in the resolution of the crisis. The group is directly responsible to the Governor for implementing strategies in coordination with Satkorlak and local governments. The group (Pokja) was also tasked with to ensure the coordinated implementation of the February 2002 Maluku agreement in Malino. Data of IDP numbers, returns and home reconstruction is collected from various provincial level offices, local governments and local NGOs. Most IDPs from outside of Ambon have indicated a preference to return to their communities once their safety is ensured, alternatively the Pokja is pursuing other options, in particular relocation, so that their lives can be normalised as quickly as possible.

Some success in both relocation and rehabilitation of homes in communities of origin is being realised: The number of destroyed houses before Malino agreement was 29,000 units and after Malino some 19,500 units. In 2002, 21,776 houses were rehabilitated by the following:

1. Department of Resettlement and Regional Infrastructure	9,234 units
2. Department of Manpower and Transmigration	1,400 units
3. Department of Social Affairs	5,000 units
4. Others (yet to be implemented)	6,142 units

Of the some 332,000 IDPs (64,000 families) displaced within Maluku, around 129, 800 IDPs (24,940 families) had returned, of the remaining 202,800 IDPs/ 39,000 families, 19,400 (34,500 families) plan to return in the near future. Assistance packages in accordance with the Government's programme of 3.75 million IDR per family, provided by both the Department of Social Affairs and the Department of Manpower and Transmigration, had only been received by 10,000 families as at the end of 2002 from the total estimate of 64,000 families entitled to assistance. Of the 13,800 IDP families that were displaced within Ambon, some 7,000 families had returned home, and around 3,500 had been relocated.

However, it is recognised some data is unreliable due to re-registrations and false registrations. Creating accurate data sets and eligibility criteria for assistance are now major priorities for the Pokja. In implementing the return and relocation programme the Provincial Government is faced with several constraints:

Inadequate funds for putting in place the agreements as laid out in the Malino-II Declaration;
Weakness of rule of law (ROL) continues to make registrations difficult and is creating a perception amongst host and home communities that the IDPs are not to be trusted;
Lack of access to land for relocation and property rights of those displaced are still unresolved;

Coordination among all the stakeholders is still difficult and services in return and/or relocation sites are still not yet fully functioning." (Bakornas PBP & OCHA, July 2003, pp. 12-13))

"The Provincial Government has recently established a Unit in charge of solving the IDP problems (POSKO) through implementation of three options: return; resettlement/relocation within Ambon Island or elsewhere within the province; and empowerment. Three Governmental institutions have been responsible for construction of houses and/or provision of materials for housing in the villages of IDPs' origin and resettlement/relocation sites: Dinas PU; Dinas Social; and Dinas Nakertrans. So far, the Government has built 14,724 houses. The return and the resettlement/relocation have been happening, though limited. As the security situation in the places of origin is a major concern for IDPs, the return to the villages where they would be a minority group in terms of religious belief has been slow. The Provincial Government has submitted a plan for empowerment that would allow the Government to provide IDR 3.75 million for an IDP (per person) as the IDP status termination fund, waiting to be approved by the Central Government." (Bakornas & OCHA April 2003, p. 2)

Key government actors dealing with the Maluku conflict (March 2002)

- Maluku is under a State of Civil Emergency and the Governor, M. Saleh Latuconsina, acts as the Regional Administrator of the Civil Emergency.
- The military's basic strategy is to prevent renewal of fighting in the hope that people will gradually learn to live with each other.
- While the military and the police have no desire to return to the all-out conflict of 1999-2000, their financial interest are served by a high level of public nervousness.

"72. Maluku is still under a State of Civil Emergency and the Governor, M. Saleh Latuconsina, acts as the Regional Administrator of the Civil Emergency (Penguasa Darurat Sipil Daerah), leading policy on all aspects of management of the civil emergency through the police, army and local government. Due to the nature of the conflict in Maluku, it is clear that the Governor has faced great difficulties in this role. The segregation of Ambon town creates practical difficulties for government employees, and the Governor has managed to maintain the Governor's office as a neutral space. Many provincial offices have relocated to the Governor's office, although it is clear that the local government has been severely disrupted due to the conflict. The Governor highlighted the areas that local government will focus on including the implementation of regional autonomy, the return or resettlement of IDPs, the provision of support and services for non-IDPs as well as IDPs, policies to address unemployment and economic recovery, and the enforcement of law and order (initially through a campaign for the public to respect law and order). The provincial government also plans to place 'Government Liaison Officers' in the villages in order to improve the communication between the people and government, and to act as a means of hearing complaints and improving public service delivery. The provincial parliament (DPRD Dati I) has formed a Special Committee (Panitia Khusus) to deliberate and hear views from the community on important issues in Maluku. The parliament highlighted health, education and marine transportation, and for international support to not involve political interests in Maluku.

73. The new Mayor and Deputy Mayor of the local city government in Ambon are committed to increase local government capacity and improving public services. They have approached the Partnership for Governance Reform for assistance, and have plans to rebuild the local government training centre. Other problems raised included: (i) there is one general hospital (Rumah Sakt Umum), which was in the Christian area and the local government plans to rebuild this and new health centers to serve both Muslim and Christian communities; (ii) the supply of electricity is still often interrupted, which increases the sense of insecurity in the community; (iii) the three units for garbage disposal have been damaged in the riots and need to be replaced; (iv) schools are in need of rehabilitation.

75. The military's basic strategy is to prevent renewal of fighting in the hope that people will gradually learn to live with each other. Many fear that once the military presence is reduced, conflict could quickly resume. One should also keep in mind that military and police personnel have a material interest in the continuing emergency in Maluku. It provides opportunities to acquire additional income, for example, by imposing "taxes" on trade and other legitimate economic activities or involvement in lucrative illegal enterprises including gambling, prostitution and narcotics. While the military and the police have no desire to return to the all-out conflict of 1999-2000, their financial interest are served by a high level of public nervousness. Occasional bomb explosions and shootings are sufficient to persuade business-people and property-owners to pay for special protection. Competition for limited resources also helps to explain the periodic fighting between army, police and marines." (EC March 2002, p. 28-30)

Key civil society actors dealing with the Maluku conflict (March 2002)

- Number of NGOs in Ambon has grown massively since the outbreak of violence from about 30-40 NGOs in 1999 to more than 500 in 2002.
- Most of the new NGOs are concerned with providing humanitarian assistance to IDPs.
- In March 2000, local NGOs and community leaders with support from civil society organizations in Jakarta formed the Baku Bae movement, which has been the most visible civil society response to the conflict in Maluku.
- Much of the local media in Maluku is organised along sectarian lines and has aroused considerable criticism for bias and provocative reporting

"77. The number of NGOs in Ambon has grown massively since the outbreak of violence from about 30-40 NGOs in 1999 to more than 500 in 2002. Most of the new NGOs are concerned with providing humanitarian assistance to IDPs, and about 100 have been supported through Mercy Corps NGO capacity building programme. Crosscommunity local NGOs are few, although during the first year of the conflict the cross-community NGO forum TIRUS held regular meetings between Christian and Muslim NGOs. There are also a number of local cross-community groups, which provide important bridges across the sectarian divide. A prominent civil society group is the Caring Women's Movement (Gerakan Perempuan Peduli or GPP), which was formed in September 1999 by women opposed to the continuation of violence and which has been active campaigning and carrying out activities in support of women and children in the community. Other NGOs are also undertaking valuable work focused on rights, gender, trauma counseling, community facilitation, health and education.

78. In March 2000, local NGOs and community leaders with support from civil society organizations in Jakarta formed the Baku Bae movement, which has been the most visible civil society response to the conflict in Maluku. Many officials and people met by the mission commented positively about Baku Bae, which plans further activities focused on (i) ending the violence through working with community leaders, (ii) law enforcement at the community level, and (iii) economic empowerment for affected communities. Baku Bae as a movement involves strategic groups in Maluku including traditional and religious leaders, the women's movement (GPP), youth groups, intellectuals and educators, lawyers, journalists and IDPs, and is a unique broad-based movement for peace in Maluku.

79. As the conflict has emerged out of the emergency phase, a number of local NGOs have shifted their attention more to advocacy work in an attempt to inform and influence local government policy. The Coalition of Non-Governmental Organisations (Koalisi Ornop) raised the issue of accountability of the huge number of NGOs working in Maluku with regards to the potential for misuse of funds from international and national sources, and issues concerning the role of unconditional humanitarian support in maintaining the status quo in Maluku without a change in the security situation. Many civil society actors met by the mission believe that the government has been slow in dealing with the conflict and has been focused on the consequences rather than the causes of the conflict.

80. Much of the local media in Maluku is organised along sectarian lines and has aroused considerable criticism for bias and provocative reporting. There are three main daily newspapers, the Christian Siwalima and Suara Maluku, and the Muslim Ambon Express. There is also a range of other print and broadcast media, including the local state radio (RRI) and TV (TVRI), both of which are located in the Christian area and have also been criticised for bias. The Laskar Jihad also runs their own radio station, Radio Suara Perjuangan Muslim Maluku, which is highly provocative in its broadcasts and, despite attempts by the authorities to close it down, continues to operate. An initiative by the Alliance of Independent Journalists (AJI Indonesia) and Baku Bae to reconcile the Muslim and Christian journalists succeeded in establishing a Joint Media Centre and better relations amongst journalists, and was reported to have reduced the bias within the media. Nevertheless, the local media in Maluku remains relatively basic and is in much need of further support." (EC March 2002, p. 30-31)

International response to internal displacement in Maluku province

Selected UN activities

UNDP conducts a North Maluku and Maluku recovery program to facilitate re-integration of IDPs (2001-2004)

- Participatory, area-based, multi-sectoral initiative designed to contribute to the recovery and sustainable development of the two provinces.
- One of the 4 objectives of the program is the return of internally displaced people (IDPs) into key communities in an atmosphere of reconciliation.

This program is currently completing the third year of its three-years time frame. For more details see the UN Consolidated Appeal 2004, OCHA, 9 April 2004, p. 58

"The North Maluku and Maluku Recovery Programme is a participatory, area-based, multi-sectoral initiative designed to contribute to the recovery and sustainable development of the two provinces. The overall objective of the Programme is to facilitate the realization of socially and economically sustainable communities living cooperatively together in freedom from fear and violence.

The four immediate objectives of the Programme, and possible activities to be undertaken, are listed below. Note that the following activities are indicative only, as actual decisions on the activities to be undertaken will be made by communities themselves, through a participatory process facilitated by UNDP.

1)The return of internally displaced people (IDPs) into key communities in an atmosphere of reconciliation. The Programme seeks to support the return and integration of IDPs into communities in a manner that is sustainable and assists IDPs take steps toward self-sufficiency. Potential areas of support include the provision of shelter and packets of household goods.

2)The rehabilitation of community-level physical infrastructure and provision of effective public services in key areas. Depending on the needs identified in particular contexts, the Programme will provide support for the reconstruction and rehabilitation of infrastructure and services in the areas of health, education, commerce, transport and communication, electricity, and water and sanitation.

3) The initiation and growth of social and economic activity with a particular focus on the most vulnerable. The Programme will support income-generating activities through means such as the promotion of micro-credit programmes and small grants schemes. The Programme may also support macro-economic development and private sector enterprise through policy support and technical assistance.

4) The strengthening of good governance practices and local governance capacities. The Programme seeks to promote the development of inclusive and accountable institutions capable of effective programme planning, decision-making and implementation. Relevant activities will include the formation of community recovery councils, as well as the provision of training and capacity development for implementing agencies and potential beneficiaries." Summary

In rural areas of Maluku Province a small-scale return movement is taking place. It is important to assist this movement by replacing short-term food relief with more sustainable livelihood support mechanisms. The intervention will focus on locally determined and managed activities that will help bridge the divided communities:

Project objectives are:

To provide 5,500 resettling IDP families and vulnerable resident populations affected by the conflict with the basic means to resume food production.

To stimulate important agro-economic activities such as fishery and small scale food processing.

To contribute to the reintegration of returning families and to support initiatives that bridge across divided communities.

The project objectives will contribute to the achievement of Strategic Goal 3 - Build local capacities to support economic recovery and sustainable livelihoods with attention to the most vulnerable, in order to increase economic self-reliance and food security, and Strategic Goal 4 -Support longer-term peacebuilding, community reconciliation and voluntary returns through participation of communities in joint decision making and fortifying linkages between communities. These Strategic Goals are outlined in Section 2.8 Response Plan for Maluku Province.

The project will be implemented in coordination with the local authorities and with the support of local/international NGOs. An agricultural kit composed of seeds, tools and fertilisers will be provided to 5,500 returning IDPs and vulnerable conflict affected families for the quick resumption of food production. The vegetables produced will diversify the family diet and generate an income through the sale of surplus produce. Training of beneficiaries in best nutritional practices will be assured. Targeted communities and returnees will be directly involved in identifying simple and locally adapted food processing activities.

Based on this assessment, simple food processing machines and technical support will be provided and shared between the different local communities and returnees. Food processing equipment for more efficient transformation of agricultural products will enhance income-generating opportunities. Canoes and fishing gear will also be provided to rehabilitate the fishery sector and support the livelihoods of 500 fishing families returning to Maluku Province. To maximise the impact on the local economy a substantial part of the canoes will be assembled locally and shared among the fisher folk communities." (UNOCHA 14 February 2003, p.60)

MSF distributes medical supplies to hospitals in Ambon, while improving water & sanitation for IDPs (May 2004)

- In response to the April 2004 violence in Ambon, MSF has distributed medical supplies to the hospitals

"Last week MSF started to distribute medical supplies to four hospitals in Ambon city, in the Maluku province of eastern Indonesia. Over the last six days, the city has been shaken by violent fighting, which has caused an estimated 36 deaths and left scores wounded. The hostilities continued last night, resulting in at least one death and three injured.

The medical organisation immediately flew the emergency supplies from Jakarta to Ambon and spent two days distributing drugs and dressing materials to the Al Fatah, Al Muqaddam, Bhakti Rahayu and GPM hospitals, all of which are treating patients wounded during the fighting." (MSF 1 May 2004)

ICMC facilitates the recovery process on Seram Island (2004)

- ICMC has developed and facilitated an informed decision-making process to support the voluntary return of IDPs on Seram Island.
- ICMC will implement the same programme in Ambon city during 2003.
- ICMC has been training local NGOs throughout Indonesia on IDP-related protection issues since April 2000.

- ICMC Safe Passage program is used to respond to basic needs of IDPs and safe evacuations in the short term in the Maluku as well as in West Papua and West Timor.

ICMC will during 2004 facilitate and foster reconciliation efforts on Seram Island

"Project Title: Community Resource and Advocacy Centre in Masohi

Women (adults): 5,000 (50% of adults)

Children: 36,400 (65% of individuals)" (OCHA 9 April 2004, p. 86)

" Addressing Barriers to Return for IDPs in Ambon City

ICMC began implementing programmes in Maluku in April 2000, opening an office in Ambon in January 2002. This year ICMC has developed and, in partnership with Malukan NGOs, facilitated an informed decision-making process to support the voluntary return of IDPs on Seram Island. Activities include conducting assessments, co-ordinating community meetings, facilitating Go/See visits, implementing peace-building programmes, identifying barriers to return, and addressing the identified barriers. Daily coordination with all stakeholders, including IDPs, communities of return, and government/military representatives (provincial, district, and sub-district levels) has proven to be mandatory to ensure safe and successful processes. ICMC also coordinates with other international agencies implementing programmes in Maluku, specifically those that provide shelter and medical support to returning IDPs on Seram Island.

Malukan Government representatives and groups of IDPs have now requested that ICMC implement a similar programme on Ambon Island, focusing primarily on Ambon City. While much of the programme flow will remain similar to the above mentioned programme, additional programme activities have been added to increase the amount of district government involvement, information dissemination, and joint community meetings after the Go/See visits to ensure all programme beneficiaries are able to make informed decisions. ICMC's proposed project supports the first overarching strategic goal in the CHAP document regarding peace-building efforts. It also supports the first and fourth strategic goal for Maluku programming concerning peace-building and return/reintegration efforts." (OCHA 14 February 2003, p. 61)

Media report weak coordination between provincial and district authorities (June 2004)

- Two local newspapers in North Maluku have reported that the lack of coordination between provincial and district governments is a main obstacle in handling the return of IDPs.

" A local newspaper, Malut Post, quoted the Head of Nation Unity and Community Protection (Kesbanglinmas) of Ternate City, Drs.A. Rahman Kharie, on Saturday (12 June), saying that IDPs problem in North Maluku has not settled yet due to lack of coordination between the provincial and the district governments. The provincial government has never involved the district government in handling the IDP return" (OCHA 19 June 2004)

"A local newspaper, Mimbar Kieraha, reported on Tuesday (4 May) that the E Commission of North Maluku Regional People's Representative Council (DPRD) accused the weak coordination between the provincial and district governments as the cause of the remaining IDPs problems in the province. The commission also accused the Provincial Social Office of being irresponsible in running its programme. There are many irregularities on the distribution of cash assistance. Around 7,748 displaced families (38,740 people) will receive assistance this year." (OCHA 15 May 2004)

Assistance in North Maluku should also aim at alleviating the plight of local population (June 2003)

- IDP families in North Maluku are reportedly fragmenting in order to multiply opportunities for assistance.
- There is now a need to assist conflict victims other than the IDPs and move towards general community development in both return and relocation sites to integrate reconstructing communities and avoid the potential for new divisions and jealousies.
- UN is of the opinion that North Maluku is an example of successful handling of the IDP crisis

"The assistance of the Central Government has been much appreciated. Although significant progress has been made, provincial authorities are further requesting continued support from the Central Government, particularly for infrastructure renewal. To monitor the progress of the rebuilding programme and ensure an efficient use of funds, the Government has established independent monitoring teams. These teams are confirming earlier indications that families are fragmenting to multiply opportunities for assistance and that sometimes assistance packages for IDPs are generating jealousies with unassisted neighbours.

Future efforts should be broader in scope to mitigate against this trend. Assistance, both governmental, non-governmental as well as international, should now be directed to conflict victims other than the IDPs and towards general community development in both return and relocation sites to integrate reconstructing communities and avoid the potential for new divisions and jealousies evolving. Throughout the villages of Central Halmahera (300 families), communities now live together, but they do not yet live as neighbours. In all efforts, the village leaders play a key role, as they have the confidence of the population.

North Maluku is an example of successful efforts for the solution of IDP crises. The national assistance in both provinces are examples of what the United Nations organisations consider to be an outstanding example, by international comparison, of very serious government commitment to IDPs." (Bakornas PBP & OCHA July 2003, pp. 14-15)

National response to internal displacement in Aceh

Government allocates USD 22 million for the management of IDPs (April 2004)

- Most of the USD 22 million allocated to the humanitarian component of the integrated operation has been used for IDP management.
- 19 camps have been set up where IDPs were provided with reportedly inadequate food, medicine, and shelter.
- Unsafe conditions in areas of return have reportedly led to renewed displacement
- Many have found their homes, property destroyed.
- An estimated 26,000 houses have been destroyed in Aceh since 2001, of which only 10,500 have been rebuilt.

"Through governmental humanitarian operation during Martial Law, 182 billion Rupiah (USD 21.9 million) have been allocated, mostly, for IDP management. The government set up 19 camps ready to house a large number of displaced persons. While in displacement the IDPs have been provided food, medicine and shelter. However, there have been reports of lacking food supplies, health problems in camps and poor sanitary conditions. People have reportedly been forced to return to their villages despite fear that the situation is unsafe. In some cases people have been forced into new displacement outside camps without support from the government, as official camps have been closed down. News reports have shown IDPs returning to an unsafe environment causing new displacement. Others have returned to find their homes, properties and livestock looted and destroyed.

An estimated 26,000 homes and 600 schools have been torched during the war. The government has worked to rebuild and restore damaged property. Only 10,500 houses have been rebuilt, and according to Serambi Indonesia (10.04.04) 161 schools have been fully restored. Meanwhile families still live in displacement in temporary shelters and with relatives, and children receive their education in emergency schools." (JRS 17 April 2004)

NGOs concerned that money intended for the civilians in Aceh may be lost to corruption (October 2003)

- Non-governmental organisations fear that money may be lost to corruption and never reach the suffering population in Aceh.

"The latest intensified phase in the war between the Indonesian armed forces and the Free Aceh Movement (GAM) continues into its sixth month, and there is still no fast solution to the conflict in sight, reports JRS Indonesia. Humanitarian organisations have still not been granted access to the region to assist the many thousands of displaced, with the government insisting on handling the humanitarian situation. The Jakarta Post reported on October 9 that the Aceh provincial administration has disbursed a third batch of humanitarian aid totalling Rp 25.7 billion (US$3 million) allocated for those widowed or disabled during the recent crack down against the Free Aceh Movement (GAM). This has been done despite the fact that 12 out of 14 regencies have yet to submit their accountability reports on the use of funds disbursed in the first two phases, according to the report.

Non-governmental organisations fear that money may be lost to corruption and never reach the suffering population in Aceh. The international community continues to put pressure on the Indonesian government, to bring about an end to the conflict and to allow humanitarian agencies access to the people in need of assistance." (JRS 31 October 2003)

Government plans to evacuate close to 200,000 civilians in an 'integrated' operation (June 2003)

- Government has committed itself to providing humanitarian assistance to IDPs in the form of food, shelter and access to medical treatment.
- HRW concerned that insufficient preparation for emergency humanitarian assistance had taken place prior to the launching of military operations
- Govt is preparing to evacuate some 200,000, starting with Bireuen district.
- Central government and provincial government will share the financial burden of the humanitarian assistance.
- Assistance will include 4,000 tents, six hospitals, food and basic supplies placed in various areas of the province
- IDP camps along the main road from Banda Aceh to Medan will accommodate some 2,000 persons each for a period of 2 weeks to three months
- Minister admits that the military operation could displace as many as 100,000 in Aceh.
- Most likely affected districts will be West Aceh, East Aceh North Aceh, Pidie and Bireun.
- Concerns that funds set aside for coping with displacement will be embezzled by local officials

"Human Rights Watch welcomes the public position of the Indonesian government that an integrated humanitarian operation will accompany military operations in order to minimize the effects that fighting will have on the civilian population. The Indonesian Government has committed itself to providing humanitarian assistance to IDPs in the form of food, shelter and access to medical treatment. The government is ultimately responsible for the humanitarian needs of the population under its authority, including those who are internally displaced. It must act immediately to ensure that the humanitarian needs of the civilian population in Aceh are met and make preparations for their longer-term support.

However, Human Rights Watch is concerned that insufficient preparation for emergency humanitarian assistance had taken place prior to the launching of military operations and that progress since then has been limited.

Since May 19, regular supplies to Aceh from North Sumatra have been restricted, in part due to a lack of drivers willing to drive on the increasingly hazardous road between Banda Aceh and Medan. The result has been a shortage of food, oil and medical supplies. On May 28 the Indonesian Red Cross told reporters that they were already facing a shortage of food and medical supplies. Unless immediate steps are taken to ameliorate this problem, a humanitarian disaster could follow.

The Guiding Principles on Internal Displacement provide basic principles on the state's duty regarding humanitarian assistance. According to Principle 18, authorities are obliged to provide displaced persons with food, water, shelter, clothing, and medical services, or to ensure their access to these necessities." (HRW 5 June 2003, p. 5)

"Minister of Social Affairs Bachtiar Chamsyah said on Monday (19 May) that the government has prepared the evacuation of possibly up to 200,000 people from war zones following the declaration of martial law in order to separate civilians from GAM fighters when security troops come in. The first area where evacuation will take place is Bireuen District, where large scale battles are expected.

Coordinating Minister for Social Welfare, Jusuf Kalla said that the government allocated Rp 400 billion (50 % central Government and 50 % Provincial budget) to provide food, shelter, health services and education for evacuees.

[...]

According to Minister of Social Affairs, Bachtiar Chamsyah, currently the number of displaced persons in Aceh province is around 12,000 people. He stated that the government is planning to erect 4,000 military tents for IDPs to be evacuated from affected villages.

[...]

Achmad Suyudi, Minister of Health stated that six hospitals are being prepared to treat possible war victims and IDPs. The hospitals are located in the towns of Langsa, Banda Aceh, Bireuen, North Aceh and West Aceh Districts.

Minister of Social Affairs, Bachtiar Chamsyah, said that the government had sent 500 tonnes of rice along with other basic needs such as blankets, mattresses and other items. The supplies are placed in East Aceh, North Aceh, Pidie, Aceh Besar, South Aceh and Bireuen Districts. Some 600 volunteers will be involved in distribution of these relief items." (OCHA 20 May 2003)

"In a meeting with OCHA representatives, the Head of SATKORLAK informed that the local Government expects to establish IDP camps for 2000 persons each, along the main road from Banda Aceh to Medan. They expect the IDPs to remain in the camps from two weeks to three months." (OCHA 17 May 2003)

"The humanitarian component of the integrated operation, as outlined by Coordinating Minister Kalla on 8 May, also has little prospect of making any significant inroads in GAM's support. Kalla has calculated that military operations could displace as many as 100,000 people and is trying to set aside funds for temporary shelter and basic food supplies for the five districts of Aceh likely to be most affected: West Aceh, East Aceh, North Aceh, Pidie and Bireun. But as Indonesia coped with close to one million displaced in the years 1999-2002, one of the most common complaints was that funds set aside for help were embezzled by local officials. How the government intends to prevent that recurring in Aceh is not clear.

Good governance is not going to matter to the GAM leadership or dampen its political aspirations. But if ordinary Acehnese who now support independence could be convinced that there was hope of a reasonable improvement in their lives under Indonesian sovereignty, they might be interested. Military operations are not going to make that case." (ICG 9 May 2003, pp. 5-6)

Distribution of termination funds to IDPs in North Sumatra suspended due to insufficient resources (April 2003)

- 24,770 IDP households reported by the local authorities in North Sumatra.
- Termination funds were received by 7,643 families, but distribution was suspended in December 2002 due to insufficient funds and new IDPs.
- By May 2003, the provincial authorities are expected to complete verification of IDPs, transfer by bank accounts the remaining terminations funds to the remaining beneficiaries.
- Once a family receives termination fund, the provincial authorities no longer consider them as IDPs neither they qualify for further IDP assistance.

"In 480 villages of 8 regions, the LAs [Local Authorities] reported a Pre-registration figure of 24,770 HHs while October 2002 re-registration exercise indicated the number as 23,153 HH of IDPs. The Central government allocated the onetime termination funds of Rp8.75millions per IDP household intended to meet the cost of transportation, procurement of building material and portion to be used for their living and resettlement. Funds for 12,000 IDP families were released by central government of which 7,643 families received the fund. In December 2002, LAs suspended the fund distribution as the IDPs number increased by over 11,000 HH and the remaining fund could only serve 4,357 families. By May 2003, the provincial authorities are expected to complete verification of IDPs, transfer by bank accounts the remaining terminations funds to the remaining beneficiaries, and accordingly will request the Central Government for additional funding. Once a family receives termination fund, the provincial authorities no longer consider them as IDPs neither they qualify for further IDP assistance irrespective of the IDPs location of residence and their conditions. Providing funds do not revoke IDPs return rights to the place of origin or alternative settlement. The decision remains up to discretion of individual IDPs for their return, residence and security. The authorities do not have comprehensive plans to resolve the IDP issues other than termination grants provided by the government and nominal assistance from the NGOs. Detailed figures obtained from the Provincial Authorities are presented in Annex-II." (OCHA April 2003, p. 2)

International response to internal displacement in Aceh

ICRC distributes hygiene material to IDPs and support PMI's work (July 2004)

- ICRC re-established a presence in Aceh in December 2003 after a 4 months break due to the government's declaration of a military emergency in May 2003.
- ICRC and PMI have distributed hygiene material in IDP camps.
- Workshops were conducted in the field of hygiene promotion for staff who work with IDPs.

"The ICRC resumed its activities in the troubled Indonesian province of Aceh in December 2003 and has two expatriate staff permanently based there. In collaboration with the Indonesian Red Cross (PMI), the ICRC is engaged in a wide range of activities from visiting detainees to dissemination.

The ICRC's resumption of activities at the end of last year came after a four-month break during the government's declaration of a military emergency. The authorities downgraded the situation to a civil emergency in mid-May.

Assistance distribution: The ICRC, in cooperation with the PMI has distributed hygiene material to families in displaced camps as well as shelter material to a small number of families whose houses have been burned down. Furthermore the ICRC has stocks at its central warehousing facilities in Aceh and Surabaya for the water and sanitation needs of 30'000 people and materials to assist a further 35'000 people with hygiene and household items.

Support for activities of PMI: The ICRC has provided evacuation and first aid material to several branches of the Indonesia Red Cross to help them maintain their capacity to treat and evacuate casualties. In order to help PMI staff and volunteers cope with a difficult and at times dangerous working environment, the ICRC has facilitated a psychological support workshop for 19 participants from various PMI branches in NAD province. It has also provided training in the field of hygiene promotion for 31 staff and volunteers who work on improving hygiene conditions of displaced populations.

Pre-deployment dissemination sessions to the armed forces: The ICRC and the PMI are regularly invited by the armed forces to provide pre-deployment sessions on basic international humanitarian law (IHL). This is usually done in a location in Aceh just prior to the field deployment of newly arrived troops.

Dissemination sessions to regional police forces: The ICRC has been able to tour the 13 regional police districts to disseminate to officers and troops basic IHL and Human Rights concepts and to present, together with the PMI, Red Cross activities and working methods." (ICRC 1 July 2004)

IOM conducts a survey in Aceh to compile information and statistics on the needs of returnees and vulnerable groups (May 2004)

"IOM reported on Thursday (6 May) that as a follow up to its district assessment training on Humanitarian Protection Needs Analysis with SATKORLAK PBP, 75 teams are currently dispatched to conduct a survey within 143 villages in 14 districts to compile information and statistics on the needs of returnees and vulnerable groups including health, water and sanitation, economic, social and infrastructure matters. The surveying teams conducted a group discussion involving community leaders, returnees, and women groups. IOM mentioned that the survey results would be used as a basis for humanitarian intervention and recovery projects by the Government, international humanitarian organisation and NGOs." (OCHA 8 May 2004)

Restrictions on presence and activities of foreign agencies severely limits operational capacity of UN and INGOs (September 2003)

- With very limited access outside the capital under Martial law, the UN has tried to maintain communication lines open with the authorities and has consistently reported back to the broader humanitarian community.
- IOM has established a presence in the province of Aceh by seconding their personnel to the Bakornas and Satkorlak but they remain unauthorized to travel to the field.
- The ICRC has recently suspended its operations in Aceh because they were not been able to gain sufficient and appropriate levels of access for their international staff to the province.
- Since June, INGOs have focused their efforts on advocating for humanitarian access at various levels. They have also pre-positioned emergency stocks and established a presence in North Sumatra in anticipation of a possible influx from Aceh
- Lack of humanitarian access remains the overriding constraint in Aceh

"Since the institution of martial law, the UN Country Team (particularly the Head of OCHA Indonesia and OCHA's representative in Banda Aceh) has endeavoured to maintain open communication lines with government representatives and the Aceh Military Command. OCHA has been consistent in communication of the results of discussions with the broader humanitarian community.

The HC has also submitted written requests to enable the international personnel of UN agencies and NGOs to work in the province of Aceh and, most recently, has met with Yusuf Kalla (Coordinating Minister for People's Welfare), a key high level decision-maker in the government, to encourage increased humanitarian access.

OCHA, WHO, WFP, and UNICEF have gained permission for international personnel to maintain a presence in Banda Aceh and some humanitarian assistance has been channelled via the Aceh government structures. However, due to both travel restrictions imposed by the Aceh Military Command and the UN Security Phase IV, independent assessments and monitoring of aid delivery have not been undertaken. UNHCR has been monitoring the conditions of those fleeing the province of Aceh and has sought to persuade the Government of Malaysia to refrain from refoulement.

IOM has established a presence in the province of Aceh by seconding their personnel to the National Coordinating Body for Disaster Response and Internal Displacement and its provincial level counterpart body (BAKORNAS and SATKORLAK respectively). IOM has been assisting in the collection and management of data and has been able to undertake some work to verify data received. Initially, IOM staff were able to travel in the province if they travelled as government officials. This practice, however has been stopped as they are now bound by the UN security guidelines for the province of Aceh.

The ICRC has recently suspended its operations in Aceh because they were not been able to gain sufficient and appropriate levels of access for their international staff to the province. Previously, the ICRC had been able to travel to all areas of the province with its counterpart, the Indonesian Red Cross (PMI).

To reinforce the need for attention to the treatment of civilians in the conflict in the province of Aceh and to help ensure accountable humanitarian action, INGOs have jointly and individually undertaken several steps:

In June, a group of INGOs initiated steps to establish agreed 'ground rules' or 'terms of engagement' in an effort to articulate what kind of humanitarian access is required and to consider how humanitarian principles should be upheld in practice. This document was then shared with the UN Country Team in an effort to stimulate a broader discussion and, it was hoped, agreement on appropriate parameters for humanitarian action in the Aceh context and steps that could be taken to achieve this goal. These discussions were not taken forward at the time, but have been renewed in advance of the IASC WG meeting.

INGOs have pre-positioned emergency stocks and personnel in order to be able to respond once access becomes possible and have also conducted training sessions for local NGOs in Emergency Response so that they can respond to humanitarian needs.

INGOs have established a presence in Medan, North Sumatra in order to be able to respond to humanitarian needs there: both in anticipation of a possible influx from Aceh and to maintain close proximity to the situation in the province of Aceh in order to expedite future humanitarian action.

Despite these efforts, the lack of humanitarian access remains the overriding constraint and it is imperative that international humanitarian agencies be able to maintain a presence in Banda Aceh in order to undertake practical negotiations and confidence-building on the ground. To date, however, there remains an absence of a coherent strategy and approach to not only gain humanitarian access, but, in doing so, to uphold humanitarian principles in practice in the provision of humanitarian assistance and in efforts to enhance the protection of civilians in Aceh." (ICVA 5 September 2003, pp. 3-4)

All international aid is distributed through local government structures (September 2003)

- International humanitarian bodies have been severely restricted in their ability to distribute or monitor the distribution of aid in Aceh.
- Despite efforts by the UN Humanitarian Coordinator and the UN Secretary-General calling for humanitarian access, none has been granted so far.
- Citing new regulations, the government has prevented humanitarian actors from providing aid directly
- All international aid is now distributed through local government structures and the Indonesian Red Cross.

"Since the collapse of the ceasefire in Aceh, and the subsequent declaration of martial law, U.N. agencies and international nongovernmental organizations (NGOs) in the province, in consultation with donors, have directed their efforts towards meeting the immediate needs for food, clean water, and shelter of those affected by the current conflict. However, international humanitarian bodies have been severely restricted in their ability to distribute or monitor the distribution of aid, due to new government regulations, ambiguity over the implementation of the new regulations, and ongoing security concerns.

On June 27, 2003, the Resident U.N. Coordinator and Humanitarian Coordinator in Jakarta, Bo Asplund, wrote to the Coordinating Minister of People's Welfare, Jusuf Kalla, requesting letters permitting all international U.N. and NGO staff to resume their activities throughout Aceh. To date those letters have not been forthcoming.

Under international law the Indonesian government is responsible for ensuring secure access for international humanitarian assistance. In a statement issued on May 29, the U.N. secretary-general called on the Indonesian government to "ensure the necessary security conditions to allow international aid organizations safe and unhindered access to affected populations." On June 20, in a briefing to the Security Council on the protection of civilians in armed conflict, the U.N. Under-Secretary-General Kenzo Oshima noted his concern at "recent policies of the Indonesian Government suggesting constraints on the delivery of international humanitarian assistance" in Aceh. Human Rights Watch shares these concerns.

All international aid is now distributed through local government structures and the Indonesian Red Cross. International aid agencies have already provided the government with substantial food aid and school and health kits. One Jakarta-based international aid worker told Human Rights Watch that the school and health kits given to the government after the first two weeks of martial law remained in Jakarta for a month before being sent to Aceh. This was apparently due to the government's lack of capacity to transport the supplies to Aceh, or to store them once they arrived in the province. Citing new regulations, the government has prevented humanitarian actors from providing aid directly, and instead has insisted that it be routed through Indonesian authorities.

Limits on access also apply to the International Committee of the Red Cross (ICRC), which initially had access to some prisoners in police and military detention. However, this access has not been comprehensive, and has not extended to all of those detained under the martial law administration. To date, very few of those detained under martial law have been charged with a recognizable offense, or had access to defense counsel." (HRW September 2003, pp. 4-6)

Humanitarian assistance subordinate to military command, OCHA finalizing inter-agency contingency plan for Aceh (May 2003)

- SATKORLAK will continue to oversee humanitarian assistance, but new coordination team (Tim 5P) will be involved.
- Governor is ultimately responsible for humanitarian assistance, but will be subordinate to the military commander
- No food emergency yet.
- WHO is finalizing the Emergency Health Contingency Plan for Aceh.
- Provincial authorities have requested Emergency Health kits to cover the needs of 200,000 people for 3 months
- CARDI and ICRC are leading the response in the field of water & sanitation
- US$ 2 million are available to support emergency relief activities of NGOs in the case of a humanitarian emergency
- OCHA is leading the finalization of the inter-agency contingency plan for Aceh.

"[...] OCHA Jakarta met with representatives of BAKORNAS PBP and the Provincial SATKORLAK to discuss coordination structures and security arrangements. The main interlocutor for humanitarian assistance will continue to be SATKORLAK, however, a newly established coordination team (Tim 5P) will also be involved. The humanitarian assistance will remain under the responsibility of the Governor, however, the Governor is now subordinate to the military commander." (OCHA 19 May 2003)

"Food

Since the expected emergency has not occurred yet, there is no pure emergency relief operation in the province. However, WFP has been involved with distribution of food to the most vulnerable groups in five districts of Aceh Province since February 2003.

Health

WHO in cooperation with Provincial Health Department is in the process of finalizing the Emergency Health Contingency Plan for Aceh. In response to the draft plan, the Provincial Health Office has requested from WHO and UNICEF the procurement of 20 Emergency Health Kits and 6 supplementary kits which can cover the essential health needs of an average of 200,000 people for 3 months in 20 districts of Aceh Province.

Shelter

Efforts are underway through the contingency planning process to determine the resources available. An estimated 9,000 IDPs are reported to have taken shelter in public facilities and with host families in Bireuen and neighbouring districts. No distribution of shelter materials or other related activities are reported.

Water & Sanitation

Discussions are underway to find available water and sanitation supplies for distribution during an emergency operation. ICRC has 4,000 hygiene kits. CARDI transported 2,500 household and hygiene kits to conflict prone districts for immediate distribution during an emergency outbreak.

CARDI in collaboration with UNICEF and ICRC is leading the water and sanitation sector.

Education

UNICEF is planning to procure 300 sets of "School in a Box" and 50 tents for distribution by the Education Department as and when needed.

OCHA has some US$ 2 million through DFID emergency funds and Australian humanitarian relief funds to support emergency relief activities of NGOs in the case of a humanitarian emergency. WFP will be in a position to quickly mobilize food supplies for short-term needs. UNICEF and WHO are working with the department of health to support emergency health activities. Funding will be required for procurement of non-food items, shelter, and watsan supplies.

There is a need to strengthen the office in Banda Aceh, both with international and with local staff. Already, one additional international staff member (Deputy Chief of OCHA Indonesia) has been deployed to Banda Aceh. In the case of movement restrictions, it is hoped that at least local staff of humanitarian organisations can have some limited access to potential IDP locations. Increased human resources will also allow quick monitoring of IDPs movement towards North Sumatra.

OCHA is leading the finalization of the inter-agency contingency plan for Aceh. OCHA is working closely with Government counterparts to help with the development of the Government contingency plans and to ensure better coordination." (OCHA 16 May 2003)

Selected UN activities

OCHA organises an IDP Management training to strengthen the capacity of Satkorlak and Satlak to deal with IDPs (April 2004)

- Conflict between GAM and government forces has caused people to flee in ten districts all over the province.
- In response to the lack of capacity of SATKORLAK PBP and particularly SATLAK PBP staff to provide an adequate response to the IDP problem, OCHA has asked a local organisation to organise an IDP management training to strengthen the capacity of both agencies for responding to the IDP emergency.

"For the past five years, Nanggroe Aceh Darussalam Province is in the turmoil of a long outstanding conflict between the Government of the Republic of Indonesia (GoRI) and Free Aceh Movement (GAM). The waves of IDPs in its peak reached as high as over 46,000 people. Many civilians are still displaced due to security problems, they have been scattered in ten districts all over Aceh Province. While the Government has been making every effort to assist the IDPs and handle the situation, it is understood that the capacity of SATKORLAK PBP and particularly SATLAK PBP staff is limited and requires strengthening. Therefore, there was an urgent need for the staff of SATKORLAK PBP and SATLAK PBP as well as other government departments involved in the IDP management issues to acquire more comprehensive knowledge and skills required for responding to humanitarian emergencies through training on overall protection issues including the rights of IDPs and technical skills in the field of water & sanitation, health, education and assessment.

Yayasan Sihat Beurata, a foundation established in 1998 for social and humanitarian activities consulted the Provincial Government and international organizations operating in Aceh to conduct technical training for SATKORLAK PBP and SATLAK PBP staff on the management of the IDP emergency so that they could respond to the situation timely and effectively. This event was also an advocacy tool for UN agencies particularly for OCHA to give more details on how they operate in the country. " (OCHA April 2004, p. 1)

"The IDP Management Training was officially inaugurated on Thursday (25 Mar.) by the Secretary of SATKORLAK PBP and the Head of UN OCHA Aceh. The training is designed by an LNGO, Yayasan Sihat Beurata, in consultation with provincial authorities and UN agencies (i.e. UNICEF, WHO, WFP, and OCHA) to improve the management skills of SATKORLAK PBP and SATLAK PBP in dealing with the IDP issues and disaster management in the province. The training is also covering topics on protection issues (i.e. the rights of IDPs and civilians in armed conflicts) and the Government's responsibilities. This is a two days training and will be conducted in three sessions/rounds consecutively. Some 150 participants from Banda Aceh and other affected districts are attending the training that is funded by the (DFID/AUSAID) Emergency Response Fund/Humanitarian Response Fund." (OCHA 27 March 2004)

UNICEF supports and protects IDP children in Aceh and North Sumatra (May 2003)

- More than 280 schools destroyed in the first 4 days of renewed fighting, affecting 60,000 children.
- Immediate education interventions include the provision of 300 School-in-a-Box emergency education kits and 50 emergency school tents, sufficient for 15,000 children for two months.

"About 23,000 children have been displaced in the new bout of fighting in Aceh (4.3 million inhabitants) which has resulted in a further deterioration of the situation. It is undermining an already weak delivery of services and protection mechanisms.

This is demonstrated by reports that in the first four days of the resumed conflict, more than 280 schools have been burnt and destroyed, affecting 60,000 children, bringing the total number of schools destroyed to nearly five hundred over the past four years.

UNICEF therefore finds itself operating in an environment where hundreds of schools have been destroyed, basic health services have collapsed, social mechanisms for assisting poor families and for protecting vulnerable children have broken down.

UNICEF and other officials expect that up to 300,000 people could be displaced within the next three months and that this displacement could last for a long period of time. UNICEF fears that many children are experiencing trauma from witnessing, or themselves being victims of, violence.

Immediate actions and interventions

UNICEF focuses its emergency assistance in the areas of education, health and child protection. Immediate education interventions include the provision of 300 School-in-a-Box emergency education kits and 50 emergency school tents, sufficient for 15,000 children for two months.

Keeping in mind the magnitude of the destruction of schools in the province and the estimation that 60,000 children have been affected, many more emergency education kits and tents will be needed. In preparation for the new school year beginning in June, UNICEF will also provide essential school supplies for more than 400 schools. "(UNICEF 23 May 2003)

IMC to improve IDPs and local hosts' access to health care in North Sumatra (2004)

International Medical Corps will during 2004 implement a one-year health project aiming at improving IDPs and local hosts access to health care as well as strengthening their economic capacity in North Sumatra:

Project title: Sustainable and Integrated Health, Environmental Health and Livelihood Programme

"Objectives:

Increase access to and quality of primary health care services for IDPs and host communities in Langkat District.

Improve access to environmental health facilities and conditions for IDPs and host communities in Langkat District.

Strengthen economic capacities of IDPs and host communities in Langkat District.

Targeted Beneficiaries: GoRI district health staff, IDPs' host communities and local volunteers (Kaders) in Langkat District, North Sumatra.

Implementing Partners: Langkat District Department of Health, local NGOs and/or CBOs." (OCHA 9 April 2004, p. 37)

NGOs condemn forced displacement of Acehese and ask for immediate humanitarian access (May 2003)

- USCR has denounced the plan to forcibly relocate 200,000 civilians in Aceh saying it will only add to their suffering
- USCR calls on both sides to respect international human rights and humanitarian law, to end the hostilities, and to resume negotiations.
- CAFOD is demanding immediate humanitarian access for partner agencies and is calling on both sides of the conflict to uphold the Geneva Conventions in protecting civilians and ensuring the safety of those displaced by the fighting.

"The U.S. Committee for Refugees (USCR) has denounced Indonesia's plan to move up to 200,000 Acehese civilians into tented camps guarded by soldiers, ostensibly to protect them from being caught in the crossfire of Aceh's renewed conflict. "While the stated goal of protecting Acehese civilians is laudable," said USCR policy analyst Jana Mason, "forced displacement will only add to the suffering of the Acehese." She added, "The best way to protect the civilians is to cease military hostilities and go back to the bargaining table."

"The understood goal of the forced movement is to more easily identify GAM members and to target with impunity anyone remaining in the villages once the civilian population is relocated," said Mason. In addition, she noted, the government believes that relocation would isolate the separatists from their base of support in the local population, thereby denying them access to assistance, information, and recruits. Burma and other countries have carried out forced relocations for similar purposes.

[...]

USCR calls on both sides to respect international human rights and humanitarian law, to end the hostilities, and to resume negotiations. It also calls on the Indonesian government to:

- 1) Refrain from any forced relocation of Acehese civilians and lift any restrictions on the movement of Acehese.
- 2) Ensure adequate protection and assistance to Acehese already displaced by the conflict, particularly by upholding the UN Guiding Principles on Internal Displacement.
- 3) Cease the targeting of human rights activists and NGO workers. Lift the ban on the operation of foreign NGOs in Aceh, and ensure the protection of all foreign and local NGO workers, as well as members of civil society.
- 4) Cooperate with the international community to ensure an adequate humanitarian response to those affected by the conflict.
- 5) Permit international monitors, including UN special rapporteurs, to enter Aceh and to fully investigate reports of human rights violations." (USCR 28 May 2003)

"Partner agencies of the Catholic aid agency CAFOD are demanding immediate access to help more than 40,000 refugees who are fleeing from fighting between the Indonesian military and separatist rebels in the Indonesian province of Aceh.

Humanitarian workers from international agencies have been denied access to the region since martial law was declared last month following the breakdown of peace talks in Tokyo -- and human rights workers in Aceh have been harassed and intimidated.

As well as demanding immediate humanitarian access for partner agencies, CAFOD is calling on both sides of the conflict to uphold the Geneva Conventions in protecting civilians and ensuring the safety of those displaced by the fighting.

The Head of CAFOD's Asia Section Catherine Sexton says: 'It's imperative that humanitarian agencies have independent access to Aceh to get help to those who need it most. We are very concerned that humanitarian workers and human rights monitors are able to continue their work without harassment.' " (CAFOD 25 May 2003)

CARDI to improve the livelihood security of returning/resettling IDP families (February 2003)

- CARDI will train five local NGOs in participatory assessment, project design, monitoring and evaluation techniques, and finance and logistics procedures with the goal that they will then conduct assessments and design a project.
- Target communities will be those with high numbers of IDPs, returnees and other vulnerable groups.
- Expected impact of this project will be increased and/or diversified income for households and increased ability to resume a sustainable livelihood.

"Project Title: Livelihood Protection in Aceh

Sector: Economic Recovery and Infrastructure

Themes: IDPs, Income Generation, Community Services

Objectives: To improve the livelihood security of returning/resettling IDP families and other vulnerable communities at risk; To increase the capacity of local organisations to design and implement livelihood protection projects in an effective and participatory manner and to represent the concerns of their communities

Target Beneficiaries: 2,000 households in two districts, five local NGOs

Implementing Partners: Five local NGOs

Project Duration: 15 months

Total Project Budget: US$ 551,000 (for 15 months)

Funds Requested: US$ 454,000 for the first year

Summary

The protracted armed struggle in Aceh has left the province with tens of thousands of currently or recently displaced persons and many more whose livelihoods have been destroyed by years of conflict. The conflict has also left Aceh chronically under-developed in economic terms (with Acehese districts consistently ranking the lowest in Indonesia in terms of food security, education, poverty and employment, and access to potable water), but, just as importantly in social terms. These factors combine to weaken the ability of households to sustain livelihoods and recover from economic shocks, or to benefit from the favourable environment brought by the Cessation of Hostilities Agreement to participate fully in civic life.

CARDI will train five local NGOs in participatory assessment, project design, monitoring and evaluation techniques, and finance and logistics procedures with the goal that they will then conduct assessments and design a project. CARDI will provide support to those local partners in project implementation and will also enter into collaboration with provincial departments, notably agriculture extension services. The target communities will be those with high numbers of IDPs, returnees and other vulnerable groups unable to recover from years of conflict without external assistance, in districts that were more particularly affected by the conflict. Community projects will assist households to strengthen their livelihood security through income generation activities, facilitation of savings, provision of access to markets, diversification of household income sources, and better understanding of their rights and their capacity to access locally available resources.

The expected impact of this project will be increased and/or diversified income for households and increased ability to resume a sustainable livelihood. Five local NGOs will be able to analyse and advise their communities about livelihood protection strategies as well as about other strategies to improve their welfare and their participation in civic debates." ICMC supports the livelihood of female-headed households (February 2003)

- Approximately 8,700 of the estimated 23% of female-headed households in Aceh are extremely vulnerable.
- The programme participants will identify economic inputs that, if received, would increase their ability to become economically stable.
- They will also participate in vocational training programmes.

"Project Title: Economic Sustainability for Extremely Vulnerable Female-headed Households in Aceh

Sector: Economic Recovery and Infrastructure

Themes: Gender, IDPs, Income Generation, Governance and Public Administration

Objective: To safeguard the lives of conflict-affected female-headed households in Aceh Timur, Aceh Utara, Aceh Selatan, Bireuen, and Pidie by ensuring their ability to be economically stable through the provision of livelihood inputs and vocational training programmes.

Targeted Beneficiaries: Total: 7,840 individuals (1,400 families)

Women (adults): 1,400 Children: 6,440

Implementing Partners: Citra Desa Indonesia - CDI (Pidie), Sue Support Group - SSG (Bireuen), Jaringan Perempuan Untuk Keadilan - JARI (Aceh Utara), Yayasan Pelestarian dan Perlindungan Alam - YAPALA (South Aceh), Pemberdayaan Haerkat Inong Aceh - PHIA (Aceh Timur)

Project Duration: 12 months

Funds Requested: US$ 351,300

Summary

Almost 23% of all households in Aceh are headed by women (174,800 / 760,000). Based on criteria and statistics provided by local NGOs, approximately 8,700 of these households are extremely vulnerable. These unnaturally high numbers are the result of years of violent conflict (killing and disabling hundreds of males every year) and Aceh's steady movement towards limiting social and economic opportunities of females. Women unable to provide resources for their families are frequently forced to depend on unsustainable international food aid, or much worse, sexual and/or political alliances against their will.

ICMC began implementing programmes in Aceh in April 2000, opening an office in Banda Aceh in early 2002. After completing a series of assessments, ICMC developed a programme to provide short-term assistance involving economic inputs to extremely vulnerable female-headed households. At this time, ICMC proposes a programme that builds upon the successes and lessons learned of earlier programmes.

ICMC will work with local NGOs to identify female-headed households located in remote sub-districts of Aceh. The programme participants will identify economic inputs that, if received, would increase their ability to become economically stable. They will also participate in vocational training programmes facilitated through local educational facilities or provided by individual vocational trainers.

ICMC coordinates the implementation of this programme with all international agencies active in the selected districts, specifically those implementing economically focused programmes. ICMC's proposed project supports both the first overarching strategic goal in the CHAP, regarding recovery and peacebuilding efforts, and the third goal of advocating, supporting and monitoring the protection of rights of all women, children and IDPs affected by conflict.

This programme also supports the fourth strategic goal for Aceh programming concerning the support of government-based institutions to provide vocational training programmes with particular focus on women and youth and maintain livelihood support for women-headed households." National response to internal displacement in Central Sulawesi

Organisational structure in handling IDPs (April 2004)

- The organisation structure in handling disasters and IDPs are BAKORNAS at the national level, SATKORLAK at the Provincial level, SATLAK at the District level, Disaster and IDP Handling Operational units at the Sub-district level, and groups at the village/kelurahan level

"The organisation structure in handling disasters and IDPs are BAKORNAS at the national level, SATKORLAK at the Provincial level, SATLAK at the District level, Disaster and IDP Handling Operational units at the Sub-district level, and groups at the village/kelurahan level. At Poso SATLAK, The Poso District Head is the Chief, The Vice District Head/ District Secretary is the Operational Chief, the Head of the Nation's Unity and Community Protection Office is the Secretary, the Chief of Community Protection Section is the Vice Secretary and military, police, Government institutions, PMI, community and professional organisations are members. In handling disasters and IDPs, all assistance into Indonesia must be coordinated through BAKORNAS and similarly at the provincial and district level, Satkorlak and Satlak respectively. The District Head as the SATLAK head is responsible to coordinate, lead, and control both structural and non structural organisations' (NGOs and other agencies) activities in handling disasters and IDPs. Therefore all NGOs and other agencies are obliged to report and coordinate all assistance provided at the district level through Satlak.

SATLAK's functions:

- To increase preparedness in handling IDPs. With assistance from UNDP, SATLAK plans to train 50 people at the disaster response units at the sub-district level. NGOs are welcome to participate in the training and in the extension activities at the village/kelurahan level.
- Organising coordination meetings with all related agencies in Poso, at least once a month.
- Private sector participation in disaster handling.
- Operational cooperation on the handling of disasters and IDPs with the nearest SATLAK in Morowali and Tojo Una Una (still joint with SATLAK Poso).
- Conduct other activities under the Governors instructions.

SATLAK's tasks before, at, and after disaster.

- Before the disaster: Create a disaster prone area map including the 17 sub-districts in Poso and Tojo Una Una Districts.
- Supported by OCHA, establish a database on the disaster's handling. This is to avoid repeating data collection.
- To improve the capacity of the community protection units and task forces.

At the village level, NGOs can use the officers' capacity as some of them have been trained on disaster management.

- To set up alternate places for disaster victims.
- To set up programmes and budgets.

At the disaster:

- To give technical instructions and send a quick response team (Military, Police and Task Forces).
- Cooperate with other agencies in providing emergency supplies..
- To provide facilities such as temporary camps, medical services, medicines and food. In this case, NGOs could provide assistance together with SATLAK or coordinate with SATLAK to prevent overlapping assistance.

After the disaster:

Report data of victims, estimated loss, needs and relocation." (OCHA April 2004, p. 2)

The key actors dealing with the Central Sulawesi conflict (March 2002)

- Provincial government in Central Sulawesi and district government in Poso are the main state institutions dealing with the Poso conflict.
- Satkorlak in Palu is coordinating humanitarian aid, rehabilitation and reconstruction at the provincial level.
- At the district level, Satlak headed by the Deputy District Head (Wakil Bupati) is co-ordinating the government emergency response.
- The lead government agency for handling the conflict is the Board for the National Unity and Protection of the People.
- A central organization is the Malino Declaration Working Group formed by the local government in Poso on 2 January 2002.

- There are roughly 3,500 security personnel in Poso.
- Civil society in Poso appears to be mostly limited to organizations associated with religious institutions.
- In Tentena, the church has established a Crisis Centre, which has been providing aid and support to IDPs and undertaking investigation and advocacy work

"Local Government and Security Forces

66. The provincial government in Central Sulawesi and district government in Poso are the main state institutions dealing with the Poso conflict. Satkorlak in Palu is coordinating humanitarian aid, rehabilitation and reconstruction at the provincial level, and the mission met with the Departments of Social Affairs, Agriculture, Health and Education who have programmes planned to support the Malino Declaration. The mission was told that the priority is for Muslim IDPs to return to Muslim villages and Christian IDPs to return to Christian villages; the later stages of the return process will involve the return of IDPs to mixed villages. At the district level, Satlak headed by the Deputy District Head (Wakil Bupati) is co-ordinating the government emergency response. The lead government agency for handling the conflict is the Board for the National Unity and Protection of the People (Badan Kesatuan Bangsa dan Perlindungan Masyarakat).

67. A central organization is the Malino Declaration Working Group formed by the local government in Poso on 2 January 2002. The working group is head by the Deputy Bupati, Drs. Malik Sjahadat, and leaders of the Muslim and Christian delegations to Malino. The working group has nine teams and 218 members from government, civil society and the security forces covering the fields of (i) socialization and reconciliation, (ii) security, (iii) law, (iv) mental rehabilitation, (iv) social rehabilitation, (v) economic rehabilitation, (vi) physical rehabilitation, (vii) IDP returns, (viii) education and (ix) health. The local government has also formed separate Muslim and Christian teams of 2-5 people to visit nine sub-districts in Poso to socialize the Malino Declaration; if accepted, the Christian and Muslim teams will organize joint meetings in each sub-district. It was reported that teams have already been formed at the village (kelurahan) level in Poso town.

68. The local governments reported that there was adequate funding from central, provincial and district government for the socialisation of the Malino Declaration and the associated programmes, but it appeared that these funds had not yet reached the local governments at the time the mission visited the province. The mission was unable to ascertain the division of functions between province and district. The first phase of IDP returns targets 1000 people and will be undertaken between 28 January– 28 February.

69. There are roughly 3,500 security personnel in Poso, comprising three battalions of police and two battalions of military troops. Security is provided by joint army and police posts in villages, and the local police in Poso had established 124 posts within the six affected police sectors (polsek) to separate the Muslim and Christian communities. They are supporting the Malino Declaration through socialisation and the collection of tens of thousands of weapons, most of which were handmade firearms and sharp weapons (concerns were raised about the continued ownership of organic weapons). The police were providing protection for people to return to their villages for 'look and see' visits, and remarked that incidents had occurred when people had returned of their own accord. The army was beginning to rebuild houses in Poso Pesisir sub-district, and it was reported that the army would rebuild about 800 houses as part of the first phase of IDP returns. Previous experience in North Maluku shows that importance of IDPs rebuilding their own houses, and it is recommended that such an approach is developed in Poso.

Civil Society and Media

70. Civil society in Poso appears to be mostly limited to organizations associated with religious institutions. In Tentena, the church has established a Crisis Centre, which has been providing aid and support to IDPs and undertaking investigation and advocacy work. The centre's vision is reconciliation and mission is education for peace, and it is also conducting activities to help people deal with trauma, to help prevent further violence and education aimed at adults and children. In Poso, the mission met with religious leaders, who emphasized their trust in local government to implement programmes to support the Malino

Declaration, and the importance of education and economic recovery. Local NGOs in Palu have responded to IDPs in Palu and surrounding areas, and formed a NGO Working Group for the Resolution of the Poso Conflict (Pokja LSM Resolusi Konflik Poso) but none have been able to establish a presence in Poso itself, limiting their effectiveness.

71. The print media in Palu (Mercusuar/Radar Sulteng) and Poso (Poso Pos) has been criticized for bias in their reporting of the Poso conflict. Training for local journalists has been provided by USAID/Internews, The British Council and national media NGOs, but it is difficult to assess the impact of these on the media. Local journalists have established a Media Centre for Peace in Poso (Pusat Media Perdamaian Poso), which will monitor the implementation of the Malino Declaration through visits and the collection data; the centre will also monitor the media to promote unbiased professional media coverage and produce publications." International response to internal displacement in Central Sulawesi

Strategic goals of UN intervention in Central Sulawesi (February 2003)

- Assistance will include building local capacities to manage and respond to future crises.

"Strategic goals

1. Maintain ongoing support to meet supply and service needs of IDPs, returnees and other affected populations, with particular attention to vulnerable groups.
2. Advocate, support, and monitor durable, well-informed voluntary choices and solutions for IDPs.
3. Together with local partners, develop and strengthen emergency preparedness capacities including early warning and monitoring systems that enable effective immediate response capacities in future crisis situations, and
4. Support efforts at the community level in conflict affected areas in longer-term peace-building initiatives, reconciliation and reintegration." (UNOCHA 14 February 2003, p. 12)

UN agencies and NGOs work within a common framework (February 2003)

- OCHA, UNICEF, CARE, CWS, IMC and Mercy Corps have agreed to conduct their programs within a Common Humanitarian Action Plan (CHAP) to increase effectiveness and coordination

"Currently, the international humanitarian organisations with presence and activities in Central Sulawesi are Office for the Coordination of Humanitarian Affairs (OCHA), United Nations World Food Program (WFP), UNICEF, CARE, Church World Service (CWS), International Medical Corps (IMC) and Mercy Corps International. OCHA, WFP and UNICEF are offices or agencies of The United Nations. Care, CWS, IMC and Mercy Corps are Non Governmental Organisations, NGOs.

The agencies and organisations have agreed to conduct their programs within a Common Humanitarian Action Plan (CHAP), to ensure an effective and coordinated support to conflict affected populations.

The strategic goals defined for Central Sulawesi are:

Maintain ongoing support to meet supply and service needs of IDPs, returnees and other affected populations, with particular attention to vulnerable groups

Advocate, support, and monitor durable, well-informed voluntary choices of solutions for IDPs (return, empowerment or resettlement)

Together with local partners, develop and strengthen emergency preparedness capacities including early warning and monitoring systems that enable effective immediate response capacities in future crisis situations, and

Support efforts at a community level in conflict affected areas in longer-term peace building initiatives, reconciliation and reintegration

The elaboration of the CHAP for Indonesia 2003 was facilitated by OCHA, with the participation of GORI, through Bakornas, UN agencies and NGOs involved in humanitarian activities. The chapter on Central Sulawesi had valuable input and recommendations from the Provincial and District Government, as well as local NGOs." (OCHA 5 February 2003)

OCHA supports the establishment of an IDP Database (June 2004)

- OCHA is supporting the Poso District Government to strengthen its capacity to coordinate assistance to the displaced.
- An IDP database, or rapid needs assessment database, was established by OCHA to enable a better data collection and to determine what assistance is required and where.
- The database collects data from all location in the district whether they are the host community, IDPs, or returnees.
- The following sectors will be covered: education, security, health and economic/income generating activities
- Now in its pilot phase the Database will be launched in September 2004.

"The Poso District Government continues to strengthen its role in coordination work established by OCHA. To aid this process OCHA commenced the establishment of an information database, including training, for the local disaster response unit within the Poso Government."(OCHA 30 April 2004)

"The project is actually not about IDP database, but it is more about rapid needs assessment database. Earlier before the project was started, the forum of regular coordination meeting agreed the importance of having such database to support their work in the district. The meeting is held monthly, attended by various government institutions, I/NGOs, and UN agencies (OCHA and UNDP).

The output of the database is a snapshot of the latest situation in Poso District. What assistance is required and in which locations the assistance is needed. This should ease humanitarian actors in determining the priority/direction of their programmes in the district. Please bear in mind that we want to keep the database as simple as possible. We don't want to make the database too complex, but in the end it takes too much time and efforts to accomplish. Any humanitarian actor who need more detail information could conduct their own survey, with more focused orientation based on their own requirements.

The database collects data from all location in the district, regardless the status of the population in the survey location; whether they are the host community, IDPs, or returnees. The database covers the following sectors:

-General situation: housing, public latrines, water facility, food, and electricity. The above categories are classified further into 3 conditions (in percentage): adequate, needs development/improvement, not adequate.

-Education: covers information about school attendance rate, requirements to increase the attendance rate, and number of schools.

-Health: covers information about the status of health facilities and diseases.

-Economic/income generation activities: covers information about the average of income per capita, percentage of income generation activities (farming, fishery, trading, etc), and main problem for income generation activity.

-Security: covers information about the latest security situation.

In addition to those information about situation on the field, the database also provide information about :

-List of received assistance

-List of active humanitarian actors

-List of required assistance for sectors: food, health, water, sanitation, shelter, agriculture, education, and infrastructure

The project is now in the final phase. We are now finalising the guideline for the pilot project in August. And we are expecting to officially launch the product in September." (OCHA 22 June 2004)

National response to internal displacement in West and Central Kalimantan

Inter-provincial coordination needed to assist the return of Madura IDPs to Central Kalimantan (2004)

- Regulations have been issued by the government and financial resources provided to assist IDPs return home.
- Coordination meeting in November 2002 resulted in the following recommendations: to assist the returns of displaced Madurese to Central Kalimantan the two provincial governments need to liaise closely; areas least affected by violence should be resettled first; central Government would assist in the smooth return of IDPs to their original homes; and funds required for returns be administered through both provincial governments.

"The provincial government has committed itself to finding alternative solutions in 2004 for the remaining 130,000 IDPs. The government has also issued regulations aimed at assisting the return of IDPs to the most severely affected districts through allocating financial resources, enhancing inter-provincial coordination, and promoting inter-community dialogue." (OCHA 9 April 2004, p 14)

"At a coordination meeting in Surabaya in November 2002, organised for the purpose of discussing the assistance for the IDPs from Central Kalimantan, it was decided that the commencement of the return process could be initiated in the near future; that to assist the returns the two provincial governments would need to liaise closely; that areas least affected by violence should be resettled first; that the central Government (Bakornas PBP) would assist in the smooth return of IDPs to their original homes; and that funds required for returns be administered through both provincial governments. The Central Kalimantan authorities held a further coordination meeting on 18 February 2003.

Government regulations have been issued in the most severely affected districts to assist the return process; and the key to success of this process is to support and follow up spontaneous returns and providing administrative operational costs. A request for operational funding support is pending with the central Government, which through Bakornas PBP has committed itself to monitoring and organising inter-provincial coordination meetings and providing other support, as nearly all the IDPs in East Java During the Joint Bakornas PBP/ OCHA mission to East Java in February 2003, the provincial authorities reported that most IDPs now in Madura wished to return, but that most of those living on East Java "mainland" wanted to remain there. have expressed a willingness to return when conditions are conducive. Already a number of events have been organised to stimulate the process of re-integration such as a Koran reading contests. " (Bakornas PBP & OCHA

Madurese IDPs take legal actions against the Government (July 2001)

- NGOs representing 28,000 Madurese IDPs forcibly removed from their homes in Sampit, Central Kalimantan, charge the police for failing to protect them from the violence and ask for financial compensation.

"The Central Jakarta District Court started hearing on Monday a lawsuit filed by five non-governmental organizations (NGOs) against the government for its failure to prevent the bloodshed in Sampit, Central Kalimantan, between February and March this year.

For its negligence, the NGOs demanded that the government pay Rp 1.9 billion in compensation and Rp 110.6 billion to help resettle people of Madurese origin who were forced to flee their homes.

The NGOs, who claim to represent some 28,000 Madurese migrants who were forced to flee Sampit as a result of the violence, charged the President, National Police chief and the Central Kalimantan provincial administration with "having done nothing to stop the ethnic pogrom and even having allowed an act of genocide to take place".

"They [the government and the police] were supposed to provide legal protection for the [Madurese] people by taking resolute measures against the rioters, but they failed to do so," Karel Tuacalu of the Commission on Missing Persons and Victims of Violence (Kontras) told the court.

Joining Kontras in taking the class action against the government were the Indonesian Legal Aid and Human Rights Association (PBHI), the Indonesian Legal Aid Institute Foundation (YLHBI), the Institute for Policy Research and Advocacy (Elsam), and the Association of Legal Advisors and Indonesian Human Rights (APHI).

The NGOs also stated that the government and the police could be charged with violating Articles 1365 and 1366 of the Civil Code for directly or indirectly causing losses to others.

The trial was adjourned until July 23, to hear the response of defense lawyers from the Attorney General's Office and the National Police Legal Aid Unit." (Jakarta Post 17 July 2001)

IOM provides IDPs with access to credit to provide sustainable livelihoods in West Kalimantan (2004)

IOM will during 2004 conduct a one year project on behalf of IDPs in relocation sites in West Kalimantan:

Project title: Credit for Co-existence in West Kalimantan

"Objective: Provide sustainable livelihood opportunities to IDP and surrounding community households in West Kalimantan and establish longer-term revolving funds in partnership with local communities.

Targeted Beneficiaries: Up to 800 IDP and surrounding community households in 4 relocation sites in West Kalimantan." (OCHA 9 April 2004, p. 106)

For more details on this project, see the UN Consolidated Appeal 2004, OCHA, 9 April 2004, p. 106)

Strategic goals of UN intervention for Central Kalimantan's IDPs (February 2003)

"Strategic goals

1. Promote reconciliation and long term sustainable solutions through the participation of affected communities, Government, national level institutions and civil society stakeholders from both provinces.
2. Ensure basic needs are met, and if necessary, increase humanitarian assistance to IDPs in Madura.

3. Prevent conflict between IDPs and host communities on Madura through livelihood development strategies." (UNOCHA 14 February 2003, p. 25)

Comprehensive assistance plan developed by NGO consortium in Pontianak but funds are limited (October 2002)

- World Vision provides IDPs with farming opportunities while other NGOs implement programs in the relocation areas.
- Comprehensive development assistance plan drafted by NGO consortium.
- Limited funding is a constraint to providing assistance

"The continued support of NGOs and aid organizations is critical. World Vision has begun a small seeds, tools, and land preparation program to enable IDPs to farm. Other NGOs, such as Save the Children UK, Catholic Relief Services, and International Medical Corps, have programs in the relocation areas. The International Organization of Migration is planning aid to improve some of the sites.

A consortium of NGOs drafted a comprehensive development assistance plan to IDPs. The plan includes: support for agriculture, health, water, sanitation, and education. NGOs would work with the government to improve the sites and provide support for long-term assistance. Unfortunately, NGOs that are providing assistance are doing so through very limited emergency funds and private funds. Additional funding and attention to West Kalimantan is needed. Last September, President Bush promised Indonesia's president Megawati Sukarnoputri $10 million to help support the displaced. Some of that was earmarked for West Kalimantan. None of this money has apparently reached USAID or the NGOs so far." (OCHA 23 October 2002)

National response to internal displacement in East Nusa Tenggara

Government asks former refugees to choose between registering as Indonesians citizens or accepting temporary resident status (April 2004)

- Government offers the ex-refugees two options: register as Indonesians citizens or accept temporary resident status
- East Timorese displaced to West Timor have since end-2002 lost their refugee status and become IDPs.
- Government offers them the option to apply for transmigration or resettlement programmes.
- The aid scheme includes housing, farmland, financial assistance, and a supply of essential goods for six to nine months, as well as support facilities like education and health centers.

"A Presidential Decree adopted in May 2003 and subsequent instructions from the Department of Home Affairs provided the former refugees in West Timor with an opportunity to register either as Indonesian citizens or accept temporary resident status (in anticipation of future return). The registration is combined with the issuance of relevant documentation, including Identity Cards." (UNOCHA 9 April 2004, p. 17)

"Those East Timorese living in camps in East Nusa Tenggara (NTT) whose refugee status ended on Dec. 31 have automatically become Indonesian citizens, a senior government official has said.

The director of the Bureau of Refugee Rescue and Protection at the National Coordinating Agency for Disaster Management and Refugee Rescue (Bakornas PBP), Bakri Beck, said Thursday that all assistance previously accorded to them would be stopped.

"They must start applying for either resettlement or transmigration programs run by the government. "Once they agree to participate in one of the programs, they will receive new assistance from the government," Bakri told The Jakarta Post on Thursday.

According to Bakri, the new aid scheme includes housing, farmland, financial assistance, and a supply of essential goods for six to nine months, as well as support facilities like education and health centers.

"With the new assistance scheme, we hope they can survive on their own harvests after nine months," he said.

Most refugees have returned to East Timor, but some 10,000 families, amounting to 28,000 people, are still living in squalid refugee camps in West Timor. Most of these were members of the military or police, and former militiamen, as well as their families.

The government has prepared a number of resettlement sites for them in East Sumba, West Sumba and Ngada regencies, all in NTT province; while South Kalimantan and Central Kalimantan have agreed to provide transmigration areas.

The "refugees" have welcomed the move, but demanded that the government provide support facilities like schools and health centers at the resettlement sites.

Bakri, however, said that not all resettlement sites would have support facilities as such facilities might be already available in the surrounding villages.

He called on the East Timorese choosing to stay in Indonesia to apply for inclusion in either a resettlement or transmigration program.

In Atambua, NTT, local authorities said that they planned to relocate at least 1,000 East Timorese families in 2003." (The Jakarta Post 3 January 2003)

International response to internal displacement in East Nusa Tenggara

UNHCR and GoRI propose 5 potential solutions for the ex-refugees (2004)

- UNHCR and GoRI's strategy proposes five potential solutions i.e. reassignment, voluntary return, resettlement/relocation, settlement and an integrated approach

"UNHCR and the GoRI have developed a strategy to find dignified and durable solutions for the remaining former refugees in West Timor through integrated efforts of the GoRI and the Government of Timor Leste, supported by the international community. The strategy proposes five potential solutions i.e. reassignment, voluntary return, resettlement/relocation, settlement and an integrated approach.

Of the estimated 5,640 former and current civil servants, Indonesian Armed Forces (TNI) and Indonesian Police (POLRI) officers, 1,800 families could be re-deployed/reassigned to other government offices in Indonesia outside West Timor with some assistance during the reassignment process. As this group mostly relies on salary/pension ('fixed earnings'), their livelihood may not be overly threatened by their relocation to resettlement sites that offer limited economic opportunities. The other 3,840 families could possibly be transferred to multiple/special settlements locations elsewhere. In addition to housing, this group would require external assistance to meet their basic needs of water and sanitation, education, health services and economic empowerment. It is paramount to have close coordination and consultations with the receiving local governments and the receiving communities in order to ensure that they will accept and integrate the resettlers into the community.

The voluntary repatriation of 1,500 families who may choose to return to Timor Leste is one of the viable options. The GoRI will continue to assist voluntary returns primarily through registration and provision of transportation, as well as the dissemination of information on the conditions prevailing in Timor Leste. Meanwhile, the Government of Timor Leste has declared its willingness to accept voluntary returnees without any time limit. Volunteers willing to settle outside West Timor on Sumba, Flores and Alor will be sought among 300 families, mainly of agricultural background. The 2,365 families unable or unwilling to return could remain in their current location or move elsewhere. For former refugees who are resettled outside or inside West Timor, support needs would include housing, livelihood assistance, as well as assistance to boost community facilities and services such as health, education and water, benefiting settled refugees and communities alike.

" (UNOCHA 9 April 2004, p. 16)

"Strategic goals

1. Advocate, support, and monitor durable and well-informed choices and solutions for the remaining refugee population.
2. Maintain ongoing support for services to meet essential needs of both refugee and affected local populations and.
3. Support community resilience through improving livelihoods, education, food security and peaceful integration/settlement of refugees and local host communities." (OCHA 14 February 2003, p. 14)
